H. H. M'CORMICK—CLAIM AGAINST ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, at the last session of the Senate the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] commented upon a letter which had been written by a Mr. McCormick upon the letterhead of the Chemical Foundation. Representatives of the foundation have addressed to me a letter inclosing a copy of an additional letter which show very clearly that the letter referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire was written without the authority of the Chemical Foundation and that the person writing it, Mr. McCormick, had no right to use this stationery of that organization. I ask that the letters which I have received be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHEMICAL FOUNDATION (INC.),
81 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK CITY,
230 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C., December 8, 1921.

Senator JAMES W. WADSWORTH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: Senator MOSES in the course of his speech this afternoon read a letter signed "H. H. McCormick," written on the letterhead of the Chemical Foundation, in reference to some claim against the Alien Property Custodian. Mr. McCormick used the stationery of the Chemical Foundation without the knowledge or consent of any person in authority. He had no right to use this stationery, as he had no connection with the foundation. When we discovered that Mr. McCormick was using this stationery, a letter stating that Mr. McCormick never had any connection with the foundation and had no authority to use this stationery was sent to those persons with whom he had corresponded.

I am attaching a copy of a letter sent from this office, and I know that Mr. Garvan will greatly appreciate it if you will have this copy inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The attached letter was signed by Miss Agnes Riordan, the stenographer who originally wrote the letters for Mr. McCormick.

Very truly, yours,

WM. F. KEOHAN.

ROBERT L. HOGUET,
27 William Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: A few weeks ago Mr. H. H. McCormick sent you a letter written on stationery of the Chemical Foundation without the knowledge or consent of any responsible person connected with the foundation.

Mr. McCormick had no right to use Chemical Foundation stationery in his correspondence. He is not now, and never has been, connected with the Chemical Foundation in any way whatever.

Very truly, yours,

AGNES RIORDAN.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is anxious to have the bill passed to-day, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass, and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn., and for other purposes."

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I request permission to report out of order later in the day from the Committee on Finance the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission, authorized under certain conditions, to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes. I have not the report ready this morning because of a little delay in preparing it, and I ask permission to present the bill at a later hour in the day.

I desire to state at this time that opportunity will be given for any member of the committee to make a minority report if he may so desire, and that it is my intention to move to take up the bill to-morrow after the close of the routine morning business, provided the pending deficiency appropriation bill has been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave will be given to submit the report later in the day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have not any objection to the filing of the report later in the day, but I should like to have an opportunity to read the bill before we take it up. If we are going to take it up in the morning and the report comes in late in the day we shall have no time to consider it at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I expect the report here in a few moments and shall certainly not take advantage at any time I may call up the bill of any Member of the Senate who has not had an opportunity to read the bill as reported.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether he expects to make the bill the unfinished business or let it take its chance to-morrow?

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to make it the unfinished business and have it disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. KING. That is, after the deficiency appropriation bill is out of the way?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

SPECIAL REPORT ON FLORIDA SEMINOLE AGENCY.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution (S. Res. 187), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Special Report on the Florida Seminole Agency" be printed as a Senate document.

JURISDICTION OF PUBLIC GROUNDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KING. I introduce a bill to which I ask the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I think he is of the opinion that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, while I was rather of the opinion that it should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have no particular choice, but will ask that the bill be stated by title and then let the Senate determine the question of reference.

The bill (S. 2813) to transfer to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the supervision of all public grounds within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, it would seem quite proper that a bill of that character should go before a committee which has had charge of the public grounds and parks of this city for 106 years. The bill relates to what are really national parks; they are administered by the National Government, by the Chief Executive of the country, through the War Department, and the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds, and have been so administered for more than a hundred years. Now, to relieve the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds which for all these years has had charge of the public parks and to place them in the hands of another committee or commission seems to me hardly appropriate. I think it quite proper that such a measure should be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have an opportunity to look at the bill for a moment.

Mr. FERNALD. I have nof had an opportunity to read the bill; but, as I understand from what I gather from the morning newspapers, the bill is designed to relieve the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds from further jurisdiction.

Mr. KING. I suggest that, pending the disposition of the reference of the bill, other Senators desire to offer bills, and I will ask that I may be permitted to withdraw the bill temporarily, in order that the Senator from Utah and my friend from Maine may have an opportunity to examine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill is withdrawn.

Mr. KING subsequently said:

Mr. President, the bill which I introduced a moment ago, and then withdrew, I now reintroduce, and request that it may be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. If that committee does not deal with it properly we will endeavor to have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

BANK OF NATIONS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Out of order, I desire to reintroduce a bill heretofore introduced by me, providing for a bank of nations, as I have amended it. I also desire to have it referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, together with an explanation of the bill; and I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with the explanation, may be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2825) to establish a bank of nations to promote and regulate commerce with foreign nations and to act as the fiscal agent of the United States was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and, together with the accompanying statement, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 2825) to establish a bank of nations to promote and regulate commerce with foreign nations and to act as the fiscal agent of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized and established an international banking institution to be known and designated as the bank of nations, with headquarters in the city of New York, and such branch offices in the United States and other countries as the directors may from time to time decide upon.

The bank of nations shall be organized in corporate form with a capital stock of $2,400,000,000, divided into 240,000 shares of $10,000 each, of which at least one-third shall be paid in gold and of which not to exceed two-thirds may, at the option of the subscriber, be paid in the form of interest-bearing bonds of solvent Governments at the current market price.

Solvent Governments shall be deemed to be such Governments as the directors of the bank of nations may certify on the bank records as prompt in the payment of their external obligations and as having in some form adopted a policy of limitation of armament and military naval expenditure.

The bank of nations shall be the fiscal agent of the United States Government and of such other Governments of the world as may be admitted as stockholders.

The Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States Government shall subscribe for and take $1,300,000,000 of the capital stock, paying therefor one-third in gold and two-thirds in the bonds of any solvent Government or Governments that he may have on hand.

Two hundred million dollars of the capital stock shall be offered for subscription at par to banks, bankers, importers, and exporters of the United States, payable as heretofore set forth in gold and acceptable Government bonds.

The remaining capital stock of the bank of nations, amounting to $900,000,000, shall be sold to such solvent Governments as may be admitted as stockholders by treaty or trade agreements negotiated by the President of the United States. In such cases the method of payment shall be as hereinbefore set forth.

The Federal Reserve Board of the United States shall act as the provisional body to receive subscriptions and fix the time for stock payments.

As soon as subscriptions to $1,400,000,000 of stock have been received the Federal Reserve Board shall call a meeting of the stockholders to select directors.

Thirteen directors shall be chosen by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President; 2 shall be chosen by the stockholders in America other than Government, and as other Governments become stockholders each shall be entitled to such representation on the directorate or such voice in naming a director as may be provided in the treaty or trade agreement, but the total number of directors shall be limited to 24, of whom not over 9 shall be chosen by stockholding Governments other than the United States. The directors shall hold office at the pleasure of those stockholders who named them.

As soon as 15 directors shall have been named they shall become the governing body of the bank of nations, and shall perfect its organization by the election of such officers as they may decide upon and elect, and thereupon the bank may be opened for business. As other directors are chosen upon the admission of new stockholders they shall take their places on the board.

The resources and facilities of the bank of nations shall be used to promote international commerce, to establish international credit, and to stabilize international exchange. To this end the bank of nations shall have power—

To accept deposits from the United States and other Governments; from banks and bankers in the United States and other countries; from importers and exporters in the United States and other countries.

To lend money to its depositors, to buy from them or sell to them international bills of exchange, to buy or sell bonds or Treasury certificates of solvent Governments, or mercantile paper growing out of imports or exports. Except in the case of Government bonds or Government Treasury certificates the maturity of paper dealt in shall not exceed one year.

To issue its notes or bank currency payable on demand in gold dollars or their equivalent in lawful money at the bank or any of its branches in other countries, but such notes or bank currency may be emitted only as a result of loans to its depositors, or by purchase of international bills of exchange, or mercantile paper growing out of imports or exports.

The amount of currency which the bank may have outstanding at any time shall be limited by the requirement that it shall keep on hand a reserve of 33 per cent in gold.

The bank of nations shall keep on hand as against deposits a reserve of not less than 25 per cent, of which not less than four-fifths shall be in gold and of which one-fifth, or 5 per cent, may be in Government bonds or Treasury certificates.

The notes of the bank shall be accepted by the Government of the United States and by the other stockholding Governments in the payment of taxes.

EXPLANATION OF THE BANK OF NATIONS BILL.

In brief form the arguments for this measure may be stated as follows:

First. A system of credit is absolutely necessary to the transaction of business under modern methods.

Second. Every nation in the world provides a system of credit for its domestic transactions.

Third. This system of credit is provided by a system of banking and currency. In the United States this system consists of State banks, the great national banking system, and finally the Federal reserve banking system, established under the Wilson administration. In Great Britain it is a system headed by the Bank of England; in France it is a system headed by the Bank of France; in Germany it is a system headed by the Reichsbank.

Fourth. In all these systems the central idea is similar, and one of the great purposes is to provide credit for the transactions of business, for if business had to be done on a cash basis it would necessarily shrink to a very small fraction of what it now is and we would revert to crude and half-civilized conditions. Perhaps nine-tenths of the business of the country is done on the credit which these banking and currency systems provide.

Fifth. All of these banking and currency systems, however, stop at the boundary of the country. They relate to domestic business only. When it comes to the great international business of exporting and importing there is no system of credit provided by law, and at the present time international business may be said to be done almost upon a cash basis.

Sixth. This plan for the establishment of a bank of nations is to apply to the international field the same ideas that have been successfully used in the domestic field—that is, to establish a great international bank, with the power to issue currency against a safe reserve of gold. The plan is to make it the business of this bank to finance international trade, to buy and sell exchange, and to lend money to importers and exporters. In a supplemental way the bill would also give power to buy and sell interest-bearing bonds of nations owning the bank.

The bill would provide for this bank a capital of $2,400,000,000. It would provide that the United States Government should take the controlling interest in the bank and sell minor interests to those nations which are willing to enter into treaties for that purpose, the treaties to define their rights and obligations.

After the United States Secretary of the Treasury had taken for the Treasury of the United States $1,300,000,000 of the stock the bill would offer $200,000,000 of the stock for sale to bankers and exporters and importers interested in international commerce. They might also have checking accounts in the bank. The bill would then offer for sale to other nations of the world $900,000,000 of the capital stock, provided they entered into the necessary treaties to become stockholders. It would make one-third of each stock subscription payable in gold and two-thirds in interest-bearing bonds of solvent Governments, meaning those Governments which had made the arrangements with the United States to reduce armaments so as to make their Governments solvent.

It is believed that such a bank would become a great international clearing house for the purchase and sale of exchange, so that the managers of the bank would know what exchange was worth instead of leaving everybody to guess and gamble, as they do at present. It would be a part of the purpose of the bank to so stabilize exchange as to prevent violent fluctuations without attempting to change the value of foreign currencies, but merely to stabilize them.

This bank would put a stop in this way to the present gambling and speculation in exchange which renders its sale and purchase dangerous and which has made exporting and importing a dangerous business and led to many bankruptcies. This in brief is the outline of the measure.

The fact is, at the present time we have in the United States about 50 per cent of all the gold in the world accumulated through the centuries. The other 50 per cent is divided among the nations of the earth, none of which has enough. There is no need to export this gold if we find a use for it. This plan provides for keeping it here and using it as a cover for the issuance of international dollars by this bank so that that currency might become a medium of exchange between the nations in international transactions. The bank would have the power to issue several billion dollars of perfectly good currency, and it could contract and expand as the needs of commerce would require. The effect would be to greatly stimulate our foreign commerce and facilitate our foreign exports, which now are in a deplorable condition, being only a fraction of what they were two years after the war. The decline in our exports is the cause of our idle factories and our depressed agriculture and our unworked mines.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD, FUEL, ETC.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a short time ago I introduced a bill, but I find that an error was made in the bill then introduced. I desire, therefore, to reintroduce it, correcting the error.

The bill (S. 2830) for the conservation of food, fuel, and other commodities in interstate commerce was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

OPERATIONS OF THE FIRST PROVISIONAL AIR BRIGADE.

Mr. BORAH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 188), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the report, or copy of the report, made by Brig. Gen. Mitchell relative to the operations of the First Provisional Air Brigade with relation to the sinking of battleships at Langley Field, filed on or about September, 1921.

INVESTIGATION OF CHINESE LOANS.

Mr. BORAH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 189), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is hereby authorized and directed through the full committee, or through any subcommittee thereof:

First, to investigate as speedily as possible the entire question of loans made, or proposed to be made, to the Chinese Government by citizens, financial associations or organizations, or banks of this country; and to include in such investigation to what extent the matter of German bonds issued by the Chinese Government and held by the German Government, or the German people, prior to the war has entered into, or become a part of such transaction.

Second, to investigate as speedily as possible all facts and circumstances touching, or relating to, the so-called Chinese consortium.

Third, to make a report of such investigation to the Senate.

EDWIN W. TRIMMER, DECEASED.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 190), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Horace C. Trimmer, Theodore L. Trimmer, Sidney C. Trimmer, Rhoda W. Pickrell, and Gail C. Peacock, children of Edwin W. Trimmer, late a conductor of elevator in the employ of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRINTING OF REVENUE LAW OF 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 34), which was read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 60,000 additional copies of Public Law No. 98, known as the revenue law of 1921, of which 10,000 shall be for the Senate, 44,000 shall be for the House, 1,000 shall be for the Senate document room, 2,000 for the House document room, 1,000 for the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and 2,000 for the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to concur in the House resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether the number of copies of the tax law authorized by the pending resolution will be in addition to the number authorized by the resolution which we passed the other day, or will that be taken into account?

Mr. MOSES. The pending resolution provides for an additional number. The resolution passed some days ago was designed to take care of the Senate without reference to the House of Representatives, and the concurrent resolution now before the Senate takes care of the requirements of both bodies. I will say for the further information of the Senator that the addition then authorized is already exhausted.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator thinks we will need this additional number?

Mr. MOSES. Oh, without question; everybody wants to know what the taxes are.

Mr. KING. They do not want to pay them, though.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calender, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice given by me on Thursday last, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator a question. This is the day, under the rule, when we are to take up the calendar by unanimous consent. I am very anxious to do that. I realize the importance of securing the passage of the appropriation bill, and I do not want to prevent its early passage, but I am wondering whether we may not provide an opportunity for the consideration of the calendar. We would have an hour and a half this morning under the rule to consider bills on the calendar. Would it be possible to have a unanimous-consent agreement to devote an hour and a half at least to the consideration of bills on the calendar after the appropriation bill shall have been disposed of? I present it as a request for unanimous consent, that upon the disposition of the appropriation bill one hour and a half be allotted to the consideration of bills on the calendar.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Washington and to the Senator from Wyoming that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] gave notice that he would desire to address the Senate this morning, and I think he ought to be afforded full opportunity to do so.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I can do that perfectly well while the deficiency bill is under consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is true; but I should like to submit a request for unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for to-day for the consideration of the bills upon the calendar under the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not agree to that, because we hope to take up the refunding bill to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It can be taken up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we would like to take it up just as quickly as possible after meeting to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Can we not take up the calendar, then, to-day after the deficiency bill is disposed of?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope it will be understood, at any rate, that after the deficiency bill is disposed of, even though it may be after 2 o'clock, we will take up the calendar instead of taking up another bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to consent that that may be done. Some reasons may be apparent then that do not exist now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on taking up the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That can only be done by unanimous consent. It can not be done by motion. I think the Senator ought not to interfere with the consideration of the calendar under the rule.

Mr. NELSON. Let the calendar be taken up after the deficiency bill is disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am perfectly willing to have that done, but I understand that the Senator from Utah is not willing that we shall take up the calendar then.

Mr. KING. The Senator misunderstood me. I am not objecting to the consideration of the deficiency bill now. I simply do not feel like consenting that at the conclusion of the deficiency bill we shall go to the calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I understood.

Mr. KING. Reasons may appear then that might make it unwise to do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But the situation now is, of course, that the taking up of the deficiency bill can be prevented by an objection.

Mr. KING. I am not objecting.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the deficiency bill ought to be taken up, but I do not like to see the calendar displaced. I understand that the Senator objects to that.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator to prefer his request when we get through with this bill. As far as I know now, I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will do that, then, with that general understanding.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If we take up the calendar after 2 o'clock, that will not prevent Senators from discussing other subjects?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it will. Speeches will be limited to five minutes.

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; if we take up the calendar under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BORAH. Then, Mr. President, I am not going to consent or stand silent when the proposition is made to take it up after 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice which I gave on the day of last meeting of the Senate, I have secured recognition for the purpose of addressing myself to Senate resolution 172, dealing with what is popularly known as the Newberry case.

Mr. President, the most interesting note which has yet been struck in the discussion of this resolution is to be found in the lofty declarations, by those who oppose its adoption, of their devotion to the purity and integrity of the senatorial title. I am not disposed, sir, nor will the rules of the Senate permit me, to impugn these declarations, nor to impute to any Senator an unworthy or unbecoming motive.

But, sir, it is impossible to believe that the movement to unseat the Senator from Michigan had a genesis other than political and partisan. The political campaign of 1918 is neither so far in the past nor were its general characteristics so shrouded in mystery that its salient points may not be readily recalled and visualized. The country was at war. A Democratic administration, disdainful of the free Republican support which it had received, had taken to itself and its favorites the benefits of the self-sacrifice of both those who went overseas and those who stayed at home; had squandered the hard-won but readily paid savings of our countrymen who subscribed so liberally to the Nation's securities; had shrunken the census returns of Democratic States and had swollen those of Republican States in order that the latter should furnish a disproportionate share of soldiers under the draft law; had arrogated to itself a portion of virtue and patriotism to which it had no just claim; had foreseen the end of hostilities which actually took place in less than a week after the election; and had capped the climax of its ineffable egotism with the readily recalled letter of the President demanding that the country should give him a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House of Representatives in order that he might continue to be the unembarrassed spokesman for the United States.

Before passing to the remarkable reaction with which the electorate of the country responded to this base and baseless appeal, it may be interesting to note, Mr. President, that Mr. Wilson therein promised to accept the judgment of the people without cavil. How well he kept this promise has passed into history, and the Nation last year gave its verdict upon it.

The President's appeal for the holding up of his partisan hands was issued October 24, 1918. The election took place a fortnight later. Within this interval the American spirit of justice and of fair play was stirred as it rarely has been in our political annals, and the response to the President's partisan plea was immediately and disastrously complete. A Democratic majority was swept out of the House of Representatives; and the Senate, wherein the Democratic Party had stood intrenched since the fateful year of 1912, saw a Democratic majority of eight transformed into a Republican majority of two.

Even without the corroborative testimony of synchronous events it would be easy, Mr. President, to discern the consternation with which Mr. Wilson and his party viewed this outcome. To lose the House of Representatives was bad enough; but to lose the Senate—that coeval and coequal partner of the President in the treaty-making power—was a cup of Gethsemane which must be withheld from the presidential lips at any cost.

The returns were no sooner at hand than the Democratic managers began casting about for ways and means to overthrow the will of the voters. A single Republican Senator barred from his seat would make this body a tie, and the then Vice President, scrupulously mindful of his oath of office, but none the less reliable in his partisanship, would hold the deciding vote. The Senate would continue in Democratic hands, with all of its patronage, with all of its machinery, continuing to work the presidential will.

Two States, New Hampshire and Michigan, seemed to offer themselves for the purpose which the conspirators had in mind. From these States—whether by complicity I can not say—telegrams were promptly dispatched by local Democratic managers to Members of the Senate and others high in national Democratic politics at Washington protesting the election as returned. I hope to speak without feeling, Mr. President, but I can not forget the embarrassment of my first hour upon this floor—an embarrassment which arose wholly, as Senators will readily understand, because I had to remain silent. I had come bearing credentials in proper form and I was known to most of the Senators then present to be the man named in those credentials; yet the senior Senator from Ohio sought to prevent me from taking my seat. His remonstrance was based upon some telegrams and letters received by him from Democratic managers in New Hampshire charging irregularities in the election, none of which, however, as the Senator was free to assert, were brought home to me. A recount had been demanded and ordered in New Hampshire, declared the Senator from Ohio, when as a matter of fact no such thing as a recount exists under the laws of my State; and the examination of ballots, which alone we provide for, could have resulted no further than to afford my defeated opponent some evidentiary basis upon which to conduct a subsequent contest for the seat to which I was clearly entitled.

Had this conspiracy succeeded, had it been possible to send my case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and to have deprived my State of the representation which I alone could have given it, because my colleague at the time was then absent in Europe, it might have been possible after the 4th of March, 1919, to continue a sure, if slender, Democratic ascendancy in the Senate and to enable Mr. Wilson to maintain at Paris that mandate from the American people which he so frequently and so falsely there declared himself to possess.

But, Mr. President, thanks to the precedents of this body, and thanks in even larger degree, as I shall never cease personally to feel, to two sterling constitutionalists on the other side of the aisle—the senior Senators from Alabama and Missouri—the Senate, without division, decided that I could not be denied the seat which I had so hardly won, and it remained for time to tell whether my discomfited opponents at home would pursue the futile protest which they had lodged against me.

For a time, Mr. President, they exercised themselves exceedingly. My State swarmed with Democratic agents of a Democratic Department of Justice. New Hampshire homes were invaded, New Hampshire women were given the third degree. A Democratic Federal judge from another State was summoned to my home city; a special Democratic prosecuting attorney was imported to present evidence to a specially called session of the Federal grand jury. The net result of all this was to disclose the fact that the deeper and closer the investigation the wider and more astounding was the Democratic irregularity discovered to be; while the chief evidence adduced against me was that towns which had been for years regularly and robustly Democratic had in 1918 gone Republican. My opponents, Mr. President, were forgetful that I had visited those towns and made speeches, the charm of which had produced a result as unlooked for by me as by my Democratic friends.

The whole moral of this New Hampshire case, which I have dwelt upon I hope not too wearily for the Senate, is that Democrats, generally speaking, are poor losers; and as an example of another sort may I direct the attention of the Senate to a special election of a Senator which took place on the same day in Idaho, where with a vote more than 35 per cent larger than that cast in New Hampshire a Democrat was elected by a majority 10 per cent smaller than mine; yet neither the Republican State chairman of Idaho nor the defeated Republican candidate in Idaho took any step whatever to deprive Senator Nugent of his victory.

Turning now to Michigan, Mr. President, we find a set of facts probably unparalleled in American political history. There are many States, sir, where the primary election laws have been drawn with such extreme liberality that any voter may choose his candidates at will, regardless of his previous partisan affiliation or of his intention to vote at a succeeding election. Michigan is one such State. But, sir, while Democrats have undoubtedly aided in making Republican nominations elsewhere, Michigan stands alone in presenting the spectacle of a Democratic President attempting to nominate a Senator in a Republican primary.

In 1918 Henry Ford was generally regarded, as he is now, an amiable and somewhat narrow-minded wizard of industry; a man capable of making motor cars, but not known to be gifted in legislation; the possessor of a huge fortune, however slender his intellectual capital; and an idolatrous burner of incense at the shrine of Woodrow Wilson. He had no political record; he had hardly ever voted; no testimony has ever been adduced that he was familiar with public life in any sense. The magic of his industrial achievements was thought to possess a talismanic quality in an appeal to the electorate; and the majesty of his adoration for the President then in the White House constituted a passport to the high favor of him who sought to place this profiteering sire of the Nation's most conspicuous slacker in a seat which had been adorned by Alpheus Felch, by Thomas W. Ferry, by James McMillan, and others of equal worth and weight. Mr. Ford was not put forward for the Senatorship by Republicans of Michigan; he was not put forward even by himself—for I freely acquit him of the vainglorious ambitions for public life and its distinctions which so often obsess those who have been successful in amassing money. He was put forward by a Democratic President of the United States, who two years before, in the welter of Republican disaster in the Middle West, had, nevertheless, seen Michigan, 54,000 strong, standing firm for Republicanism and Hughes, and at the same time reelecting its senior Senator by the triumphant majority of 107,000. For Mr. Wilson to win a Senator under any circumstances in such a State, Mr. President, would be a tremendous achievement, but to win a Senator in such a State and to seat him in the ranks of political opposition would be a triumph Homerically sardonic.

Small wonder, Mr. President, that the Republicans of the country, and especially the Republicans of Michigan, stood aghast at this appearance of the cuckoo's egg in the robin's nest of politics. To prevent its hatching was the duty of every Republican not only in Michigan but elsewhere; and to prevent its hatching those who opposed it, those who dreaded it, were justified in employing any and every method which law and a sense of political honor would permit.

And, Mr. President, its hatching was prevented by legal and honorable means. The magic of Henry Ford's name, the glamor of Woodrow Wilson's prestige, the recruited forces from all the allied, affiliated, and associated enterprises which fed upon Ford were elements of political strength not to be despised; to beat Henry Ford and to thwart Woodrow Wilson was a job for a real Republican, well worth a real Republican's doing.

Truman H. Newberry was then as now a man not given to self-glorification—modest, high charactered, successful in the business world, and with a fine record of public service which he was at the moment enlarging by donning for the second time the blue of the Navy. He was on duty in a distant State; he was engrossed in the responsibilities which his position laid upon him; he was not seeking political preferment; he was striving only to serve his country. His age, his domestic situation, every claim, indeed, which made men exempt from military duty freed him from the sacrifice which he was making—a sacrifice which he did not seek to avoid when his embattled political brethren in Michigan called upon him to lend them the prestige of his character and record, although he might readily have liberated himself from the strict routine of the Navy for the freer and more enjoyable life of the hustings. He gave what he could, his consent; and, like our colleague from West Virginia, went on calmly serving under a Commander in Chief who was striving to humiliate him in the political battle raging back home. And the record of this case, Mr. President, contains no conclusive evidence that at any time Senator Newberry had any detailed knowledge of political events in Michigan save that he was a candidate and that his friends were doing their best for him against a well-organized, well-equipped, and none too scrupulous opposition.

It is significant, Mr. President, that the emphasis of this case has been constantly laid upon the primary election in Michigan. The dreary effort through a physical recount of the ballots cast in the general election was barren of result. No one directly questions the validity of the credentials presented here by Senator Newberry; and no one attacks them except collaterally and antecedently by assailing the primary.

The Supreme Court has spoken with finality, as I had thought, Mr. President, upon this phase of the subject; yet the assault upon Senator Newberry goes on with unabated virulence, though its foundations were long since destroyed by judicial T. N. T.

There are Senators across the aisle who look askance at these proceedings, Mr. President. The distinguished leader of the minority is on record as deprecating a Federal inquiry into a primary election. In a Washington dispatch printed in the Birmingham Age-Herald of August 1, 1920, I find the following:

Senator UNDERWOOD, who unexpectedly returned to Washington last night, will not encourage the effort of certain Alabamians to induce the senatorial investigating committee to inquire into the expenditure of money in the recent primary in Alabama.

In stating his reason he voiced a fear lest in the event of Republican national success this fall he and his Democratic colleagues in the Senate will be compelled to prevent the passage of a force bill.

"I was very glad when I learned that Judge Leon McCurd, of Montgomery, had charged the grand jury to inquire into the campaign expenditures of candidates in the recent primary," said Senator UNDERWOOD.

"There is very little doubt in the minds of men who talked with me in Alabama that one of my opponents and organizations supporting him expended a minimum of $250,000. While the tapping of the barrel was not as pronounced in Montgomery as in a certain other section of the State, money was spent in Montgomery. So the grand jury may be able to find some evidence.

"There is no question but that the expenditures should be investigated. There should never be another election in Alabama featured by the tactics which featured the last. But the investigation must be made by ourselves through our own courts.

"We should not permit the setting of a precedent of a Federal inquiry into a primary election."

But the precedent is already here, Mr. President, set by the Senator's party associates in their persecution of the Senator from Michigan. If parity of reason should be applied to Alabama as to Michigan, would not we on this side be justified in calling upon the Senator from Alabama to show cause why he should retain his seat, inasmuch as, if one of his opponents spent a minimum of $250,000 in the Alabama primary, he must have spent more than that amount himself in winning the nomination?

I have said, Mr. President, that the energetic movement which I have termed a Democratic conspiracy to upset the will of the people in the election of 1918 was confined to two States. I have also pointed out how with a far better basis for action the Republican managers failed to stigmatize the title of the Democratic Senator from Idaho. There is yet another element in the picture. Three States in 1918 were called upon to elect a Senator for an unexpired term. One of the group was Nevada, where the Hon. Charles B. Henderson had been serving by appointment of the governor and where he became a candidate to succeed himself. Senator Henderson received a certificate of election and no Republican assailed the validity of his credentials. An independent candidate, however, Miss Annie Martin, had contested in the Nevada election, and her right to challenge the result in her State was as unquestioned as Henry Ford's in Michigan. She exercised that right, and entered into correspondence with the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On January 7, 1919, Miss Martin wrote to the senior Senator from Ohio as follows:

RENO, NEV., January 7, 1919.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
Chairman Committee on Privileges and Elections of United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR POMERENE: I note with interest the firm stand you took in the Senate on December 14 for an investigation by your committee of the campaign expenses of Mr. Newberry. Your position commends itself to all Americans desirous of securing justice in elections.

As a public duty, in order to help enforce the purity of election laws of the State of Nevada and of the United States, that the voters may choose their representatives uninfluenced by unfair or corrupt practices, I protest against the violation of both State and National statutes in the recent election in Nevada.

Reports filed with the secretary of state by the Democratic State central committee and other Democratic organizations working for the election of the Democratic ticket, headed by Senator Charles B. Henderson, show an expenditure that greatly exceeds the maximum of $15,000 allowed each political party for campaign expenses by the corrupt practices act of the State of Nevada.

I affirm that the election of Senator Henderson by such means constitutes a violation of the laws of the State and of the acts of Congress relating to "campaign contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected."

As further evidence of the manner in which the campaign was conducted, Federal officials contributed to Mr. Henderson's campaign fund, an action strictly in violation of law. The records show that Mr. Fred L. White, postmaster of Reno, contributed $200 to the Washoe County Henderson Club; that Mr. William Woodburn, United States district attorney, contributed $500 to the same fund; and that Mr. William Kelly, internal-revenue collector, contributed $250. (Sec. 14, act of Cong., 22 Stat. L., p. 407.)

In addition, the reports referred to give inherent evidence of incompleteness and of inconsistencies that demand investigation.

I therefore ask you as chairman of the Senate Committee on Elections to hold an investigation to determine what sum was really spent to elect Senator Henderson, and how far the laws of the State and of the Nation have been violated.

Very truly, yours,

ANNE MARTIN.

To this the chairman of the committee made the following reply:

JANUARY 21, 1919.

Miss ANNE MARTIN, Reno, Nev.

DEAR MISS MARTIN: I have your favor of the 7th instant making the charge that the election of Hon. Charles B. Henderson as United States Senator from the State of Nevada was brought about by "a violation of the laws of the State and of the acts of Congress relating to campaign contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected."

If you will send to me a memorandum of any evidence or proof you may have sustaining these charges, I will submit it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for its consideration.

Very sincerely,

ATLEE POMERENE,
Chairman Committee on Privileges and Elections.

And, on January 30, 1919, Miss Martin telegraphed from Reno in these words:

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
Chairman Committee on Elections,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Memorandum of evidence sustaining my charges Nevada senatorial election will be mailed you to-morrow by registered post in reply to request in your letter of January 21, which has just been received.

This memorandum can not now be found in the files which were turned over to the Secretary of the Senate at the conclusion of the Sixty-fifth Congress. It never was laid before the committee, so far as I can ascertain. Is it therefore an unfounded suspicion, Mr. President, if one should now conclude that the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the Sixty-fifth Congress was interested in the purity and integrity of the Senate's personnel only on the Republican side of the Chamber?

The senior Senator from Ohio, whose interest and zeal in the Newberry case have been so consistently persistent, is not in the Chamber. He is not even in the country. He is engaged in discovering whether a republican form of government exists in Haiti and Santo Domingo. Upon his return he will doubtless be able to explain to the Senate what has become of the Henderson dossier. The information, however, Mr. President, will be, if I may quote the words of a distinguished New England jurist, "late, reluctant, and unimportant," because Mr. Henderson no longer sits among us and the Republican majority of two which the people gave to this Chamber in 1918 has now been multiplied a dozenfold. But it will remain passing strange, Mr. President, that the Senator should have continued so unremitting in his pursuit of the Senator from Michigan alone when he had in his hands the evidence of what, as Miss Martin has declared to me, was "a more lavish use of money in the Nevada election in proportion to the population than was spent by the Republicans in Michigan."

The Michigan case, Mr. President, has waxed fat upon rumor, although the figures of expenditure in Michigan have never, even by the tongue of gossip, been named in an amount to equal the sum which the minority leader declared was spent in Alabama. Had we on this side of the Chamber seen fit to shape our course by the fitful stars of tittle-tattle we could have called to the carpet more than one Senator on that side of the aisle, and conspicuous among them would be the senior Senator from Georgia, where even with the mighty aid of Woodrow Wilson and all of the administration forces Gov. Hardwick was hardly defeated, and Kentucky, whose brilliant senior Senator belittles his talents in picayunish assaults upon the Senator from Michigan, though his own State two years ago and even yet has echoed with the rumbling rumor of irregularity at the polls.

There is another aspect to this effort to maintain the purity and integrity of the Senate which I feel justified in discussing. It is noteworthy, Mr. President, that the most violent of the attacks which have been made here upon the sitting Senator from Michigan have come from Senators representing the Southern States. In one sense, sir, this is indeed natural, for the representation of the Democratic Party in this body is now almost wholly from that section of the country. But I can not escape some feeling of amazement that even under these circumstances Democratic Senators should feel warranted in the excess of language which they have employed in this discussion.

A few comparisons, Mr. President, may possess pertinence.

Alabama has 298,143 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 214,168 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 512,311. The vote electing a Democratic Senator in 1914, in this State, was 63,389.

Arkansas has 284,301 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 111,523 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 395,824. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1916 on a vote of 110,293.

Florida has 124,311 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 89,884 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, making a total of 214,195. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1916 on a vote of 58,391.

Georgia has 353,569 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 267,047 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 620,616. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1914 on a vote of 61,107.

Louisiana has 240,001 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 174,918 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 314,919. This State elected a United States Senator in 1916 on a Democratic vote of 78,000.

Mississippi has 192,741 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 232,412 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 426,953. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1916 on a vote of 72,290.

North Carolina has 357,611 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 148,523 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 506,134. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1914 on a vote of 121,342.

Oklahoma has 395,377 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 51,889 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 447,266. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1914 on a vote of 119,443.

South Carolina has 165,769 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 169,277 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 235,046. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1914 on a vote of 32,950.

Tennessee has 433,431 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 119,237 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 558,668. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1916 on a vote of 99,567.

Texas has 838,962 white male citizens of 21 years and over, 167,395 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 1,006,357. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1916 on a vote of 301,957.

Virginia has 363,259 while male citizens of 21 years and over, 159,873 colored male citizens of 21 years and over, a total of 523,132. This State elected a Democratic Senator in 1916 on a vote of 133,056.

These figures, Mr. President, relate solely to senatorial elections. It is doing no violence to the subject if we address ourselves briefly to the figures presented by congressional districts.

For example, Mr. President, the State of Alabama and the State of Minnesota elect the same number of Congressmen, 10; the State of Georgia and the State of New Jersey choose 12 each; the State of Florida and the State of Maine have 4 apiece. The State of Louisiana and the State of Kansas have 8 each.

The bracketed States of Alabama and Minnesota contained populations, respectively, and in round numbers, of 2,138,093 and 2,537,167. Their respective total vote in the year of which we continue to speak was 122,815 for Alabama and 311,333 for Minnesota. In other words, Mr. President, the vote in Alabama possessed something more than two and a half times the political power of a vote in Minnesota. The comparison between Georgia and New Jersey is even more illuminating. Georgia had a population of 2,609,121; New Jersey had a population of 2,537,167. Georgia's 12 Congressmen were elected with a total vote of 133,965, while to elect a dozen Representatives from New Jersey it required 413,810 votes. A vote in Georgia was more powerful than three votes in New Jersey. Florida and Maine are equally interesting to study. Florida had a population of 752,619; Maine's inhabitants numbered 742,371. Each elected four Congressmen. Florida by sending 83,173 of her people to the ballot box, while in Maine 149,507 Yankees were required to do the work of about half that number of Crackers. The last in our quartet of grouped States, Mr. President, are Louisiana and Kansas, the former with a population of 1,656,388, the latter with a population of 1,690,949. Each State elected eight Congressmen, but it took 523,211 to turn the trick in the Sunflower State, where full equal suffrage then as now prevailed, whereas in Louisiana, where full and equal suffrage has never prevailed, it required only 35,941 votes of the ruling oligarchy to send their eight men to Washington. In other words, Mr. President, a vote in Louisiana in 1916 had fifteen times the political power of a vote in Kansas.

I am prepared to be told, Mr. President, that all this has no connection with the election of a Senator in Michigan. I am equally prepared, sir, to resist that assertion. The adage of law is that he who seeks equity shall do equity; and it is equally aphoristic that those who declaim about the purity and integrity of the Senate should have equivalent consideration for the purity and integrity of the entire legislative establishment. The money changers were scourged not only from the porch of the temple but from the entire sacred precinct; and if elections are to be inquired into inquiry should not hold in a few isolated States of the North but should proceed with diligence over the whole extent of the Union. According to the figures which I have above quoted, Mr. President, no less than 37 Members of Congress and an equal number of members of the Electoral College exercise their functions on the basis of a counted though submerged population in contravention of the language and the intent of the Federal Constitution.

It will be urged that States alone may regulate the qualifications of their voters. It will be urged, too, that under this authority many States, including my own, have cast restrictions about the exercise of the franchise. This is true, Mr. President, and so far as I am concerned I am entirely willing that my State shall pay the price which the Constitution exacts from those communities which, having for any reason abridged suffrage, shall have their representation reduced in the proportion of that abridgment. It certainly can not be claimed, sir, that New Hampshire, with a total population of 460,000, yet casting a total vote of 156,000, has abridged suffrage in any like proportion with the State of Alabama, whose population is 2,138,000, yet casts a total vote of only 232,000.

Mr. President, I can not state with accuracy the reasons which the Southern States advance for their repressive election laws. I can not say whether they are necessary for preservation of law and order, for the maintenance of economical government, or even, if you please, for the upholding of white supremacy. But this I do know, that in the Southern States which I have hitherto enumerated there were in the census of 1910 more than 4,000,000 white males of voting age out of a total qualified electorate of 5,761,000, yet those States cast only 1,251,000 votes, which, even had they been exclusively white, would indicate that the oligarchy of 30 per cent is ruling both white and black in that section of the country. The privilege thus obtained is high and valuable. Why is it not worth paying for? Where is the boasted chivalry of the South?

The President of the United States in his recent visit to Alabama took up this question with a courage worthy of our recollection of him here in this body and of our knowledge of him as he sits at the other end of the Avenue. Lip service was freely rendered to him by representative men of the Southland. Is it too much to hope, Mr. President, that words may now be translated into deeds and that in view of the approaching reapportionment made necessary by the recent census we may have an inquiry, widespread and searching, so that the purity and integrity of American representative institutions shall be maintained everywhere?

I speak of this now, Mr. President, because during the Sixty-sixth Congress I deemed it my duty to present a resolution calling for such inquiry. I asked that it might be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which had been so diligent in pursuing the Michigan investigation, but the Vice President referred it to the Committee on the Judiciary, where it slept painlessly.

The Vice President vouchsafed no reasons for refusing my request. Later, in several southern newspapers, I read—and I now quote from the Birmingham Age-Herald:

> There are southerners on the Judiciary Committee, and the resolution in all probability will die a-bornin'.

Mr. President, I had and have no desire to legislate exclusively for one section of the country or against another. My desire solely is that we shall be a nation and not a group of sections; that our laws shall be fair and equitable; that the Constitution shall operate equally in every community, and that the purity and integrity not only of the Senate but of all our institutions shall be maintained. To those on the other side of the Chamber who have so vigorously opposed the resolution which we are now considering I can only say: "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye but not the beam in thine own?"

Mr. President, the day is not far distant when the Senate will pass finally upon the contested election in Michigan. I shall vote for Senator Newberry, and I shall vote for him because I believe him innocent. The vengeance of Henry Ford has already been invoked upon the Senate.

Not long since I received the following letter:

GRANITE TRUST CO.,
September 29, 1921.

"IT RESTS WITH THE SENATE TO CLEAN ITS OWN SKIRTS, AND IF IT FAILS I PREDICT THE PEOPLE WILL DO THE WORK, BECAUSE I WILL CARRY THE CASE TO THEM."

Mr. SENATOR: The above is what Henry Ford says, as you will see from the inclosed clipping from to-day's Boston Herald.

In many ways I do not like Mr. Ford, and I do not want him to be a United States Senator, but I believe he is absolutely right in saying that if you and your fellows do not unseat Mr. Newberry for his flagrant defiance of law in securing his election the people will express their resentment.

Mr. Ford is a fighter when he is aroused, and he has both the connections throughout the country and the money to tell people the facts, and when people are told the fact story here—a story that has to do with the very basic part of our Government—the people will take action

Sincerely, yours,

DELCEVARE KING.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CARAWAY. I merely wish, before the Senator gets through with his tirade against the South, to ask him one question.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator is too late; I shall finish in one moment. If he will withhold his question until then, I shall be very glad.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would rather ask it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. MOSES. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator is very much perturbed by reason of the fact that certain Negroes in the South are not permitted to vote.

Mr. MOSES. I did not mention any Negroes not voting in the South.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator did. I did not think the Senator was conscious of doing it, but that is what he was talking about.

Mr. MOSES. Just one moment, please. I only enumerated the total population and the total vote cast. I enumerated them, it is true, by stating first the total white and then the total colored population, but I made no discrimination, even as we make no discrimination in my own State.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, he even commended the President for going down to Alabama and saying that the Negroes ought to vote.

Mr. MOSES. I beg the Senator's pardon; I said the President called this thing to the attention of the southern people. I can not permit the Senator to make my speech for me. He can read it in the RECORD, and comment on my very words tomorrow, but I can not go on here with a discussion between the Senator and myself as to what he thinks I said and what I know I said.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know what the Senator said. Of course, he is now undertaking to repudiate it.

Mr. MOSES. I repudiate nothing.

Mr. CARAWAY. I believe the Senator was very bitterly opposed to granting suffrage to the women in his own State.

Mr. MOSES. No; I was trying to save the women of my State who did not want suffrage.

Mr. CARAWAY. And those who did want it you did not want to have it.

Mr. MOSES. The great majority of the women in my State did not want it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Do you think the Negroes in Arkansas, for instance, are better qualified to vote intelligently than are the women in your own State?

Mr. MOSES. I shall not pass upon that question, but I will say that in my own State every person of voting age who is eligible to approach the ballot box, male or female, white, black, or copper colored, may come and vote freely and have his or her vote honestly counted.

Mr. President, recurring now to the letter which I received from Mr. Delcevare King, I do not know how many Senators have been similarly menaced by this friend of Henry Ford, who bears such a resoundingly royal name. Nevertheless, I do not question his assertion that Henry Ford has the necessary money to invade any State. According to the junior Senator from Georgia, in a recent speech made here, Henry Ford retains some $21,000,000 of public money, which he took from a tax-burdened people during the war and for which he has made no accounting. Would it not be well for him to return this money to the Treasury, with interest, before permitting his henchmen anywhere to threaten Senators with the resentment of a people who care nothing for Henry Ford or his millions?

Mr. STANLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the pending deficiency appropriation bill came from the House to the Senate on the day before we adjourned at the last session. We took up that bill in the Committee on Appropriations on the first day of the present session last week; we hastened its consideration as rapidly as we possibly could, and I was instructed by the committee to report the bill to the Senate on Thursday last, and the Senate immediately adjourned over until to-day. The bill contains appropriations of money for the payment of disabled soldiers who are in the hospitals and those who are receiving vocational education to the amount of over $60,000,000. The appropriation which has heretofore been made for that purpose will be exhausted before the 15th instant. I realize that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] has a perfect right, of course, to discuss subjects other than the pending bill. I did not ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to desist in his speech, because he had given notice of his purpose to speak before I had notified the Senate of my intention as to the consideration of the pending bill. I hope, however, that too much time may not be consumed in the discussion of extraneous matters, but that we may proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that my remarks will be brief, for I realize the importance of the pending legislation.

Mr. President, I am surprised rather than angered at the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] or at least his reference to the senior Senator from Kentucky. For one I am not inclined to criticize the partisan. This is a Government of parties, and while the Senator from New Hampshire has shown himself a partisan of partisans, vitrolic, I will not say narrow, but certainly intense, I have considered him fair; at least I thought he hoped to be fair and manly, endeavoring to be just. The gallant and accomplished Senator from New Hampshire was the last man I would have suspected, even in the present emergency, and in the desperate strait of a despicable client, of even an implied sanction to an ugly, false, cowardly, and anonymous assault upon the honor of a colleague on either side of the Chamber.

My comments upon the manifest corruption with which the Senator from Michigan is charged have been free from any personal ill will or political bias against the Senator from Michigan. My abhorrence was of the offense, not a narrow, partisan hostility to the man or his party.

It is true, Mr. President, there were mutterings and rumblings when I took my place in this great body. It was necessary to find somewhere a counterirritant, to raise a false issue, to divert attention from the open infamy of the Senator from Michigan and the conduct of his campaign; so a loose, unfounded, unsubstantial, and ugly charge was made touching the honor, the patriotism, and the disinterested devotion to his country and his State of the governor of Kentucky, now the senior Senator from that great State.

I dare the Senator from New Hampshire; I defy the sponsors and apologists of Mr. Newberry here to counsel him, under fire and under ugly charges, to walk one single step in the path trod by the senior Senator from Kentucky. He would no more do it than he would leave that wooden battleship in Central Park and face a real gun and a real enemy.

It was charged, sir, that I used the high powers of the governor of Kentucky in selecting men under the draft for the service of their country, and that I so manipulated those boards as to further my own political ambitions. There is nothing except falsehood and cowardice behind that ugly and anonymous charge, for no man has ever made it and no man will ever dare to make it over his own signature here or in Kentucky. When that anonymous charge was made I went before the Committee on Privileges and Elections; I asked for an investigation, and waived every technical right. I did more; I said, "Bring on your proof; I will appear before any committee you may name; I will ask no question about its personnel; I will take a solemn oath in advance that no man shall be heard in my defense except a Republican of known worth and standing in his party."

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Until this moment, Mr. President, I have never known what formed the basis for the rumors to which I referred in my prepared remarks. I merely knew that there were reports regarding the election in 1918 in Kentucky. I merely knew that the story in more or less nebulous form had been brought to my attention at the time when my own title had been called in question here. I will say for the benefit and information of the Senator from Kentucky, for whose talents I have great admiration and whom I can never thank too much for the complimentary words with which he began his speech, that I thought it was poor sportsmanship to be threatening the title of any Senator upon tittle-tattle, upon unsupported charges.

Mr. STANLEY. And is it not poorer sportsmanship to raise dust about the charges against the sitting Member from Michigan by throwing again into the air this foul, unseemly slander first hurled at me by a coward, that will never be repeated as true by any man not at once a liar and a fool?

Of course the Senator knows nothing of the truth of this accusation, but any old scandal, any old dirty thing, no matter whom it touches, can again be opened up and referred to in this high place for all the world to guess what was the nasty thing, what were the ugly rumblings about the Senator from Kentucky, who was born in honorable poverty and is poorer now than when he was born. Such position as I have attained in my profession or in public life is as free from suspicion of the use of a dirty dollar as a virgin's honor, unassailed and unassailable. I have won upon my worth; I have never prostituted any voter by an appeal to his cupidity, to his cowardice, and his lack of loyalty to his State and to his country.

I said to the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, "I want my record shown. Now I can speak of it. Two charges have been made—an abuse of the pardoning power, with which you have no concern a bit more than you have with the color of my eyes, and abuse of my power as governor, as a Federal officer, with which you are concerned." I invited inquiry.

I never named a commission, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, that was not absolutely bipartisan from the top to the bottom. I was the only governor, as I am informed, in the United States—Democrat or Republican—whose commissions had no partisan bias. The most powerful and strongest Republicans in the State were on the commission named by me. My esteemed friend the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] is present here to-day, and he knows, and, if questioned, will say that there were no greater towers of strength in his party and no more intense partisans that Fred M. Sackett, who was my food commissioner; than that gifted lawyer, William Cochran, brother of the Federal judge; than Richard C. Stall, the election commissioner of the State; than Green Garrett, head of the railroad commission; and yet those men were upon the highest commissions. The Council of National Defense had for its chairman Mr. Edward Hines, and when the present governor of Kentucky gave notice that he would name a nonpartisan commission for the control of the charitable and penal institutions he named Edward Hines, the man whom I had named as the chairman of the Council of National Defense.

Officers in charge of the recruiting and the disbursing were promoted according to their efficiency. Some were made lieutenants, some were made captains, and two were made colonels, and one of the two was the disbursing officer from Kentucky, Henry Rhodes.

There are not a half dozen States in this Union that assembled their soldiers with greater efficiency, that had a smaller proportion of desertions. Not one single train was ever kept waiting for the brave boys eager to do and to die for their country. They assembled to the minute. I worked from early morning until late at night with all the vigor and with all the strength that God has given me. I was too old to go out and do the great part; but all that I had left in that high place I gave without stint and without thought of partisan advantage to that flag in that solemn and awful hour.

Those who bear my name will receive nothing in the way of patrimony; but the conduct of their sire as the war governor of Kentucky will never make a scion of my race blush or offer an apology. I then and now invite the fullest discussion. I repeat here and now upon the floor of the Senate what I have often repeated before, that I court an inquiry. I will bring only Republicans to testify before it, and if the committee fails to exonerate me I will resign the seat I hold. I would not hold a seat in this body by a narrow appeal to partisan hate and partisan prejudice and partisan indifference to my infamy. I would not sit here five minutes under the shadow of Truman Newberry's guilt to wear all the crowns that ever adorned the head of tyranny, to wield all the scepters that ever cursed power. Let him follow my example.

They had an inquiry in Kentucky touching other matters. I was under no obligation to go, but I went. I found this inquiry, touching the conduct and expenditures of the governor of Kentucky, held behind closed doors. I threw the doors wide open. I stood in those open doors and said: "There is one thing you can not do: You can not close these doors."

They said: "It is for the protection of persons who are liable to be wrongfully accused." I said: "Let the slanderer show his face. Bring in all the world. I prefer to be tried upon a mountain top. I have never exercised executive clemency, however great may have been my mistakes, that I did not believe I did my duty before my countrymen and my God, and I am anxious to answer for every official act. I am ready to account to all the world for every dollar received and every dollar expended as governor of Kentucky." At last this nosing committee found, and I admitted it was true, that I had fed my bird dogs in the penitentiary. Yet those things must be lugged in here in an effort to save the bedraggled name and the stained honor of a man tried by a judge of his own party, and convicted by a Republican jury; and now you would save him by a majority in a Republican Senate who have not the conscience of a Republican judge or the shame of a Republican jury!

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I presume that the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] this morning is notice not only to Democrats but to Republicans who are in favor of unseating Mr. Newberry that he is to be seated.

The Senator from New Hampshire has talked about rumors. He has gone out into the primaries of other States. He has told what rumor said about them. He is trying to get away from the issue involved here.

Mr. President, when I was a boy I used to chase the red fox. In the spring of the year, when the mother fox was rearing her young in the forest, when I sounded my horn and started away for a chase, the mother fox—cunning, smooth artist that she was—would get up and come around between my dogs and her young. She would lead the dogs away out into field and wood remote from the abiding place of her young, and finally lose the hounds miles away from her young ones. That was what she was trying to do.

That smart performance of the cunning fox came to my mind this morning when the Senator from New Hampshire was speaking. He wants to lead us away from the issue—Mr. Newberry. Is he to be regarded as the special ward or proud offspring of the Republican Party? Are the Senators on the other side ready to stand sponsor for him? Does the Senator from New Hampshire think that he can theorize about rumors of large expenditures of money in primaries of other States, and that that will justify him and others who will vote for Mr. Newberry, in supporting him, when the facts in this case clearly establish his guilt?

The Senator referred to my State. Mr. President, when the senatorial campaign was on in Alabama between my colleague, the able senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and two other Democrats in my State, I was engaged in a race with four other gentlemen for the nomination for the Senate, and I do not know much about the conduct of anybody's else campaign, but I do know about my own. There is no suspicion of wrongdoing connected with my nomination or election, and, thank God, no cloud rests upon my title.

I had no hired agents—not one. I never spent a dollar unlawfully or unjustly. I received my nomination and election at the hands of an upstanding, proud, and incorruptible people.

In the other race for the Senate in my State I do know that certificates were made in that primary by my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and by his opponents, Mr. Musgrove and Mr. Weakley, to the effect that they did not expend more than $10,000 each. If the Senator from New Hampshire wants to challenge those statements he has a right to do so. Anybody else had that right; but it was not done so far as I know. How can the Senator justify himself now in voting to hold in this Chamber a man who has literally purchased his seat here by talking about rumors as to what was done in the race of Senator UNDERWOOD or Senator Henderson or Senator STANLEY of Kentucky? That does not get him away from the issue here, nor is he going to be permitted to get away from it, nor are any of those who vote to seat Mr. Newberry ever going to get away from it.

Mr. President, Shakespeare tells us that when the ghost of Hamlet's father appeared on the castle grounds of Denmark, Marcellus, a castle guard, said: "Speak to it, Horatio." The evil spirit that Washington warned us against is not standing menacingly at the door of this Chamber. It has entered and now stalks through this historic Hall. Washington warned us against the baneful influence of money in politics. I never dreamed that the day would come when any Senator would stand here and solemnly defend one who had bought his seat in this body, and yet that is just what is being done here now.

There is not an intelligent man in this body or outside of it who believes that Truman H. Newberry would have a seat in this body but for the excessive use of money in the Michigan primary. There is no one here or elsewhere who believes that but for the lavish and unlawful use of money in that primary Truman H. Newberry would hold a place in this body. That is true. If it is true, what right has he to sit here?

I heard of a young man who said not long ago that as soon as he got money he was going to join the golf club at Chevy Chase. I heard of another fellow who said that as soon as he got money enough he was going to buy a seat on the Stock Exchange in New York. There are some men in this country—and they are not all confined to any one party; they belong to both parties—who think that when they get a pocketful of money they would like to buy a seat in the United States Senate. They have gone out after them in the past. They will do it in the future unless those who sit here, having sworn at the altar place of this Chamber to protect the honor and integrity of this body, will shut the door in their faces and not permit them to enter.

Mr. President, is this body to become simply a clearing house for political tradesmen? Is the membership here to be confined in the future to men of enormous wealth? God spare the Republic from such a fate!

The Senator from New Hampshire has waved the bloody shirt here this morning, has raised a sectional issue. There certainly should not be any sectional issue raised in the consideration of a question of this kind. It is my duty, as much as it is the duty of the brave and able Senators from Idaho and Iowa, to protect the integrity of this body and its good name. I am a Democrat; they are both Republicans. In a case of this kind we ought to lose sight of politics and strike hands about a common center for the honor of this body and the good of our common country.

What can the Senator hope to accomplish by the bitter speech that he has made about the conduct of elections in the South? His statistics regarding my State are misleading and incorrect. We have more white men in Alabama than we have Negro men, but, according to the Senator's statistics, as I heard them, there are about 50,000 more Negro men in my State than white men. We have a good many more white men in Alabama than Negro men.

I desire to propound a question to the Senator from New Hampshire. There are some counties in my State where the Negroes are in the majority. The white people who live in those counties sprang from the stock that lived in the South when knighthood was in flower. I wish to ask the Senator if he would deprive us of the right to protect the ballot box and sovereignty of the white race there, and if he would favor putting Negroes in office over the white people of those counties?

Mr. MOSES. I assume the Senator wishes to be answered.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator for an answer.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, in the course of my remarks I stated I was unable to state accurately the motives which led to the repressive election laws of the Southern States. I sought to point out, however, that if in order to maintain law and order, in order to maintain an economical government, in order, if you wish to state it that way, to maintain white supremacy, it is necessary to abridge the suffrage, why are you not willing to pay the price which the Constitution says you shall pay for that great and lofty privilege? If you wish to rule by an oligarchy in Alabama, why are you unwilling to have your representation in Congress and in the Electoral College abridged in proportion as you abridge suffrage? That is the constitutional penalty exacted for the great right which you say you are taking in those counties and elsewhere. Why are you not willing to do it? That is all I want to know about Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I answer the Senator from New Hampshire by saying that the Supreme Court of the United States has passed upon and upheld the suffrage laws of Alabama. They conform to the Constitution. The Senator would deprive us of our representation, cut it down, and put a penalty upon us for daring to stand for white supremacy in this country.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. I am not sure whether the Supreme Court has declared, in terms, the validity of those election laws. My own impression of it is that the court has ducked the question about as often as it has come up.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, yes; the Supreme Court has passed upon the suffrage article in the Alabama constitution.

Mr. MOSES. I accept the Senator's statement as to that, he being a very distinguished member of the bar. With that statement I admit that the abridgment has taken place by constitutional means. The Constitution further provides that when abridgment has taken place representation may be abridged in the same manner, and I ask the Senator if he is willing that that shall be done? Let him compare his State with mine. We have a total population of somewhere around 460,000, and the people cast 156,000 votes in that little State. One person in every three votes there. The Senator represents a State, if I recall, with something more than 2,000,000 population, and the highest vote I find recorded in any statistics for the past 10 years is 232,000—1 person in 10. Is the Senator willing that Alabama shall pay the constitutional price for the constitutional privilege exercised there?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator knows that in my State, as in some Northern States, a nomination is equivalent to an election, and as soon as a candidate is named everybody knows he is going to be elected; they want him elected, and a great many of them do not go to the polls. The matter is decided in the primary. That is why the Senator will frequently see a very small vote cast in the general election in some of the Southern States. That is one reason I am saying here that Senator Newberry corrupted the primary in Michigan, a Republican State, bought up the machinery, purchased newspapers, hired agents, and purchased men outright, if you please, and put his machinery in such form that nobody could defeat him in the general election. The question was settled in the primary. He knew that if he got the nomination he would get through at the general election.

Mr. MOSES. I know perfectly well that there are many States in the Union where a nomination by the Democratic Party is equivalent to an election. That certainly is not so in the section of the country from which I come. There one fights for his nomination, and then fights for his election. But I believe that the figures would show an equally deplorable condition of affairs in reference to the primary election. I do not happen to have on my desk at the moment the primary statistics of the Southern States, so far as I have been able to get them, but I do recall one State, not the Senator's State, but the State of Mississippi, where, as every one knows, in 1918 there was a very spirited contest for the Democratic nomination for Senator between the sitting junior Senator and ex-Senator Vardaman, whom he defeated. The total vote in that primary for the three candidates running, who, I think, were Vardaman, HARRISON, and Noel, was a little rising 107,000, and the State of Mississippi has eight Members of Congress. In my State, Mr. President, we cast 156,000 votes at an election, with only two Members of Congress.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in the year to which the Senator has referred there were 100,000 Mississippi boys in France fighting for the country. That, of course, reduced the vote in that election.

Mr. MOSES. How many of the hundred thousand were colored boys, who would not have been permitted to vote no matter where they were?

Mr. HEFLIN. Some of them were Negroes, serving in one capacity or another, and we have the best Negroes in the world down there, if people like my distinguished friend from New Hampshire would let them alone. These long-distance politicians and misguided champions from other sections come with their half-baked nostrums and vagaries and suggest to us how to solve a problem that we have had ever since their forbears sold the Negro slaves to us at magnificent figures, and then set them free without paying us a single dollar. I will tell my friend from New Hampshire what we are going to do with that question some day, if they keep on nagging at it and fooling with us. Why we are going to let them have it up there nearer home. There is food for thought in that suggestion. The white people of the South are going to protect the sanctity of their homes, the integrity of the white race, and maintain white supremacy at any cost, no matter what it is, and if the time should ever come when leaders like the Senator from New Hampshire can control the Republican Party, and they shall undertake to put the Negro above the white man in the South, we will send the problem up there and let the Senator from New Hampshire and others there handle it at close range.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. I merely wish to point out to the Senator, Mr. President, that they are willing to do all this at any cost, he says, save that of paying the constitutional price of having their political strength shorn.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator is a brilliant lawyer, although he may not have studied law; he is quick to catch and retain a point.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I am not even a member of the bar.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said whether the Senator had studied law or not. I told him just a little while ago that these suffrage laws of all the Southern States had been passed upon and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, which decided they were in accord with the Constitution of the country. Still the Senator wants me to agree with him that we should be shorn of some political strength. We are doing nothing that is unconstitutional now, and we do not intend to be shorn of strength that rightfully belongs to us. I can tell the Senator another thing in this connection.

Mr. MOSES. That may be true of the present, but it will not go on forever, for I want the Senator from Alabama to understand that the free voters of the Northern States are sick and tired of going into every election with the dice loaded against them. The Senator knows perfectly well that with a free ballot and a fair count in his State, if they would take on the constitutional penalty for the abridgement of the suffrage, the Democratic Party would not carry a national election in a thousand years. Some day, Mr. President, the Republican free voters of this Nation are going to realize that, and some day, cloture or no cloture in the Senate, something will be done about it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator is innocent of all kinds of knowledge about my State and the other Southern States. Even if they were to reduce the representation, as he has said, he might sit here until the stars grow old and the sun grows cold and he would never see a Republican in the Senate from down there. We have only a few Republicans down there, and it is as impossible to produce Republicans on a large scale in my State as it is to grow watermelons on Greenland's icy mountains. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOSES. That is probably true, Mr. President, but if we have the situation which I am suggesting will one day come Alabama will not be casting 12 votes in the electoral college.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I find consolation in the thought and in the conviction that my friend from New Hampshire does not speak for the Northern States. He is one in a hill upon this question. I have talked to northern people upon this subject, some of them Republicans, who do not want to bother and hamper the South in the solution of this race problem, and when the Senator from New Hampshire and those who entertain views like his inject that question into discussions in this body they are hurting rather than helping us in a right solution of the race problem. We know best how to solve it. We have it, and, as I said a while ago, we are going to solve it in our own way to the highest and best interest of both races. Mr. Lincoln once said, the Senator will recall, that he opposed making voters or jurors of Negroes.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WARREN. I do not like to interfere with the discussion, which is very interesting, but the race question and matters connected with it will be with us always, I suppose, and will always lead to a great deal of debate. While we are debating that, the suffering soldiers of the late war are anticipating, and naturally so, being without money on the 15th of this month. After we pass the deficiency bill it must go to conference and there be agreed upon, then both Houses must pass upon the conference report, then the bill must be enrolled, signed, and go to the President and be approved before the 15th or the United States will be in default in about $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 due the soldiers. So I wish the Senator might join with me and put the further discussion of this matter over until a more convenient time.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be through in a very few moments. I regret that my good friend from Wyoming did not think of this while the Senator from New Hampshire was speaking.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator was in the Senate the other day and again this morning——

Mr. HEFLIN. I knew it was an oversight, or that the Senator was absent.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from New Hampshire gave notice, prior to the time that I gave notice of the calling up of the appropriation bill, that he wished to address the Senate this morning. He waited until this bill came up, and of course addressed his remarks to the deficiency bill, which, by the way, the Senator from Alabama has neglected to do.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is it the Senator from Alabama neglected to do?

Mr. WARREN. To direct his remarks, when he commenced, to the bill before the Senate.

Consequently I did not know of the ammunition and projectiles that were in store, and I am only pleading now, not as a matter perhaps of right but as a matter of sympathy for our friends, the soldiers who need it, that we may be able to get the appropriation bill through.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I assure the Senator that I will not speak but a few minutes longer. I had not intended to speak, but there were many misleading things in the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire and an attack upon my State and other Southern States, a waving of the old threadbare bloody shirt, and I felt it my duty to say a few words.

Now, no one has any more sympathy for the soldiers than I have. I will vote for anything that suggests fair treatment for the soldiers of the great World War. I voted to square the account with these boys and grant them adjusted compensation, when 500,000 of them were walking the streets of the country hungry and unemployed. The RECORD shows how I stand with regard to the soldiers.

The Senator from New Hampshire is responsible for this discussion. He has injected the Negro problem into this debate. Like the old fox that I spoke about awhile ago, he is doing this to lead the minds of certain people away from the issue that Newberry bought his seat in this body.

Mr. President, when the War with Spain came on and we saw Fighting Joe Wheeler of Confederate fame and the son of Gen. Grant bivouacked upon the same battle field and marshaled beneath the same flag, one would think that the War of the Sixties was over and that we had indeed and in truth a reunited country. Then when the war came on with Germany the nations of the earth were engaged in the bloodiest war that ever cursed the world, and southern boys and northern boys were side by side on the fields of France. I remember a beautiful poem written by one of them:

Here's to the blue of the wind-swept North
When we meet on the fields of France
May the spirit of Grant be with you all,
As the sons of the North advance.

Here's to the gray of the sun-kissed South
When we meet on the fields of France
May the spirit of Lee be with you all,
As the sons of the South advance.

And here's to the blue and gray as one
When we meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of God be with you all,
As the sons of the flag advance.

No politics there, but 100 per cent Americanism was seen on every hand. Mr. President, Alabama boys, Idaho boys, Iowa boys, New Hampshire boys, all fought and died side by side. What were they fighting for? They were fighting for the honor of the flag, fighting for the preservation of American ideals and institutions, fighting for the preservation of the American Republic. What would they think if their spirits could look down from the parapets of the sky and see seats sold in the citadel of national legislation in the country for which they died 3,000 miles away from home?

The Senator from New Hampshire can not by the miserable tactics he has employed here to-day get away from this issue. We must settle the question now, Are seats in the United States Senate for sale and traffic to the highest bidder?

This man Newberry bought a seat in this body. You might go around and say he expended too much money, he resorted to this method and that which was reprehensible, but stripped of all its smoke-screen devices, he has bought a seat in the Senate, and the question is, Are we going to become a party to the crime? The Senator from New Hampshire can not come lugging into this debate rumors about other State primaries, and dodge the issue by reflecting upon my State and other Southern States, where the race problem is now being solved. Senators, we have very decided and fixed convictions upon this subject. We need your friendship and good will. I shall never forget President McKinley—God bless his memory. I was a member of the Alabama Legislature appointed on a committee of three with the speaker of the house and Maj. Robinson, of Mobile, to invite him to come over and address the Alabama Legislature. He was in Atlanta attending the peace jubilee, following the War with Spain. We went up to his room at the Kimball House, a hotel in Atlanta. He said, "Gentlemen, I appreciate the invitation you have extended. I have seen it in the newspapers, and I am going to accept it. I want you to know that I have been invited to speak to the colored people at Old Ship Church, in Montgomery, and I desire to know whether it would be agreeable to you gentlemen for me to do so. I do not want to do anything that will hurt, but on the contrary I want to help you if I can in solving this race problem. I said to him, "No, Mr. President, we have no objection in the world to your speaking to them. You can speak to us in the capitol, and then speak to them at their church. You have been giving them wholesome advice in all of your speeches in the South. You know the serious situation here, and we feel that we have your sympathy."

He accepted the invitation and came and made a speech to us, and then spoke to them and told them in substance that we were the best friends they had, and that they should not antagonize the great white race in the South.

The Senator from New Hampshire does not come out openly and declare it, but his position in effect is that wherever the Negroes are in the majority they should be put in office over and given dominion over the white people. I again remind the Senator that it may be that some day, in the settlement of this race question, he will have acquired a good sprinkling of them in New Hampshire. Let the Senator bear in mind always that we will do whatever is necessary to protect and preserve inviolate racial integrity and white supremacy.

Every white man and woman in the South who reads this unwarranted attack of the Senator from New Hampshire will think of the carpetbaggers who infested the South just after the war of the sixties and gave us a reconstruction mantled in a saturnalia of crime that shocked and astounded the civilized world. Confederate soldiers, many of them lame and halt, and members of the Ku-Klux Klan, with their muskets, walked the roads in the nighttime and guarded the homes of the widows and daughters of their brave comrades who died in battle, protecting them from burly black brutes drunk on their new-found freedom. We had scalawags and carpetbaggers who would tell them, "Take these homes; they are yours; drive these people out. We will colonize you in this section. Let these white people go elsewhere."

Thank God there were not enough of them to have their way. A number of northern Democrats and some Republicans did not sympathize with that policy. I dislike to see the Senator from New Hampshire lugging that question into the discussion to-day in an effort to cover the tracks of a man who left the dollar mark behind him every time he put his foot down in his race for the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I like to hear things said here that make for American solidarity. I wish to see this Union knitted closer and closer together in the bonds of a loyal national love. Any man, be he Democrat or Republican, who seeks to stir up sectional feeling and hate is an enemy to the flag, an enemy to the country. We ought to contribute only those things that make for closer and more cordial relationship between the sections. I would remind the Senator from New Hampshire, since he has attacked the South, that more courage was never shown in battle than the Southern boys showed on the battle fields of France. I would remind the Senator from New Hampshire that the very States that he has been criticizing to-day furnished the boys who broke the Hindenburg line.

The Senator from New Hampshire said a while ago that nobody had suggested that Senator Newberry had expended as much as rumor said was expended in the last Alabama senatorial primary. I was satisfied the Senator had not read the record and that he did not know what the testimony was when he spoke, because the now lieutenant governor of Michigan wrote to Mr. Newberry, while his race for the Senate was on, and told him that it was currently reported that they had spent or were spending in Newberry's race for the Senate anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000. Mr. Newberry has never opened his mouth as to whether the charge of the lieutenant governor, who is a Republican, was true or not that they were spending from $250,000 to $500,000. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire would keep that in mind.

I wish to say that they, Mr. Newberry's friends, admit spending about $200,000 in the senatorial primary. If they will admit that, I would like to see those bank books, checks, and stubs that were lost. I have my suspicion about how those things came to be lost, and I will tell it to the Senate. I think Mr. Newberry's friends deliberately burned those check stubs and bank books and destroyed them for the purpose of hiding that testimony from Senators in this body. That is what I think was done with them. Are we going to seat a man who comes in here with such clouds of suspicious circumstances and scandal upon his title?

The Senator from New Hampshire will send his speech up into New Hampshire and the other New England States, showing that he has criticized the primary system in the South and the disfranchisement laws of the South, for the purpose of making them forget the Newberry case. He can not do that. When this tale is finally told and the record of this debate is finally made up, they are going to cull from it the nuggets of truth and they are going to be sent into every State in the Union. They must be submitted at the judgment bar of the men and women voters of the various Commonwealths and let them ask the Senator who voted to seat him when he comes up for reelection—"Are you a United States Senator?" "Yes, sir."

"You were elected to represent us in the United States Senate?" "Yes, sir." "You were present when the Newberry case was decided?" "I was." "Did you vote to seat him?" "I did." "Did you read the letter of Osborn, the former distinguished Republican governor of Michigan, who told Newberry that if he denied that he knew they were spending great sums of money in his campaign he was an ass and a liar?" "Yes, sir." "Did you read the letter of the lieutenant governor, a Republican, in which he told Newberry he ought to withdraw from the race; that he had been conducting a scandalous campaign the result of which Michigan would not recover from in 25 years; and that they had expended from $250,000 to $500,000?" "Yes, sir." "You read the testimony of Fred Smith, the confidential agent of Newberry?" "Yes, sir." "He swore that he checked upon the joint fund of Truman H. Newberry and John Newberry." "Yes, sir." "You heard Mr. Paul King testify that he was Newberry's manager?" "Yes, sir." "And that he did whatever he thought was necessary to do to win the race without regard to cost?" "Yes, sir." "You knew that the law of Michigan provided that a candidate for the Senate could not spend more than $3,750 in a senatorial election for all purposes?" "Yes, sir." "You heard the Newberry managers admit that they spent $200,000—52 times as much as the statute of Michigan said they should or could spend?" "Yes, sir." "You took an oath when you went to the Senate from this State that you would support the Constitution and protect and defend it against all enemies, foreign or domestic?" "Yes, sir." "And in the face of this record you ask us to elect you again to the Senate?" "Yes, sir." "Well, we bid you good night and goodbye." [Laughter.] Why, Mr. President, he will get it right where he ought to get it, where the chicken got the ax—in the neck—and he ought to get it there.

I would not vote for a candidate who would vote to seat a man in this body under the facts in this case, I do not care who he is; I would not vote for a man for membership in this body who, in the face of this testimony, would vote to clothe the man charged with the unlawful expenditure of money with power to deny the soldiers who saved the life of my Nation a just settlement when they return in want and are walking the streets hungry in the land that they saved. I would not vote to give such a man the power to grant a bonus of nearly $200,000,000 to the profiteers of the country and deny a fair settlement to the soldiers who saved the Republic and the civilization of the world. I will not vote to permit a man to sit here as a United States Senator who by the unlawful use of money procured a seat in this body.

Mr. President, this whole Newberry transaction is covered all over with dollar marks from the day he wired Paul King to be his manager, from the time he reached the deck of the wooden vessel in the park in New York, where he posed as an officer in the Navy looking for enemies out upon the high seas as he sought to deceive the people of Michigan, to the day when he wrote Paul King a letter saying, "I will never cease to be under obligations to you for the work that you have done."

What sort of work? Dickinson said, "It is so scandalous that it is referred to only in terms of 'boodle' and as 'rotten,' and it will take the State 25 years to recover from it." Newberry said in that letter, "To-morrow we shall see the fruits of your work."

Who furnished the sinews of war for that work?

The Newberrys—but I do not care whether they furnished it or not, it was furnished with the knowledge and consent of Newberry, and I do not care whether the expenditures had his knowledge or consent, for so long as I hold a seat in this honored body and have sworn to support the Constitution and to defend it against domestic and foreign enemies I am going to stand with drawn sword at the entrance here and say to those who come, "I do not care whether you are a Democrat or Republican, if you have such scandalous credentials you are an enemy to my country; you shall not sit in this body."

I have said here before, and I want to repeat it before I sit down, that the manly thing for this man to do is to come down here to the floor of the Senate and say, "Senators, the majority of the committee—Republicans—while they are willing for me to have a seat here, condemn the money spent in my campaign. They say it was excessive; far too much. So they do not give me an entirely clean bill of health. The minority members deny that I ought to have a seat here and say that I expended money excessively and unlawfully and that I ought not to be seated. So both groups of the committee have cast some cloud and taint upon my title. In order to make it clear that I do not want a seat here that is not free from taint and which I did not obtain honestly I am not going to bother you with this thing any further. I am going to wire the governor of my State my resignation, and I am going back and ask the people of Michigan to give me a primary; and I will show you a primary in which there will be no expenditure of money in a corrupt or unlawful way, and I will ask vindication at the hands of the State which it is claimed I have shamed, discredited, and dishonored." That would be the honorable thing to do. But is he doing it? No. He even refuses to talk.

I should love to know what he paid Paul King to manage that campaign. I am satisfied he paid him $50,000, perhaps $100,000. I do know that they tried to get Mr. Hayden here in Washington, and Mr. Hayden told them it was going to be a money campaign, and that he did not want to have anything to do with it. Then this man Cody said, "Oh, do not talk in that way; he [Mr. Newberry] will make you such a fabulous financial offer that you can not afford to refuse it."

Senators, was it the manly worth and merit of this man Newberry that they were holding up to the people of Michigan? Was it the principles of right and justice that he stood for? No; it was the power of filthy lucre in politics. The power against which Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln warned us. That was the inspiriting and dominating force all through the Newberry campaign. Mr. President, I wish I knew how much he paid Paul King. I wish I knew how much was expended. I am satisfied they expended in that campaign anywhere from $700,000 to $1,000,000.

Oh, Senators, seats in this body are being sought. The mighty rich are seeking to control a majority of them. They have in the past succeeded in buying a seat now and then in this Chamber. I now recall two instances. In one case a Republican was involved and in the other a Democrat. Lorimer, a Republican, and Clark, of Montana, a Democrat, were unseated. Money bought the seats of these two men, and the Senate lived up to its oath and kicked both of them out of this body, and now we are asked to truckle and crawl in the presence of the wealth of Mr. Newberry because Wall Street and Detroit say, "This man must be seated." Word has gone out from those who made big campaign contributions to the Republican Party that Newberry must be seated.

Mr. President, is Mr. Newberry resigning, as I have suggested that he should? No. He is dodging and slipping and sliding around; now you see him and now you do not. But he has never testified here; he never testified in Michigan; he never testified before the Senate committee. Senators, what do you think the common-sense man and woman in this country will think of that? If I were charged with having bought a seat in this body, would I sit in a court and permit myself to be convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary? He was sentenced, I believe.

Mr. KING. He was sentenced, and then the sentence was set aside.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; when the Federal statute was declared unconstitutional.

Would I permit myself to be convicted and sentenced and sit silent through it all, charged with corrupting the voters of the State, with poisoning the very life of my Commonwealth at its source? But he sits with folded arms and sealed lips through it all, impervious to any suggestion of the scandal into which he has plunged his State, and then he comes to the Senate, welcomed by some on the other side and taken into the fond embrace of others. I imagine my good friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] threw his arms around his neck and wept tears of joy upon his bosom.

The committee entered upon an investigation. Did Mr. Newberry open his mouth there? Not a word was uttered by him. Did he look like he wanted to do this thing properly in an open and above-board manner? We can not judge so from his conduct. Did he go to the committee room and ask to be permitted to be heard? No.

Did the majority members ask him to come in? No. Did the minority say, "We ought to bring him in"? Yes. What did the majority say then? They said, "We are not going to invite or request him to come before the committee." So we have in this Chamber, for the first time within my recollection of parliamentary procedure, a request of Senators on a committee denied by the controlling party. It was done, however, in this case.

Why was this man shielded? If he had been a poor man and charges had been preferred against him, they would have had his hide rattling around, but it is different in the case of a man of immense wealth in these days of materialism under Republican rule, when they are trying to reverse the doctrine of Lincoln and put the dollar above the man. Lincoln said he wanted to keep the man above the dollar; he favored the democracy of humanity rather than the aristocracy of the dollar; but we see the old order returning by the conduct of some on the other side. Did Mr. Newberry testify there? Not once. Then the case came into this Chamber, where sworn men must sit to try it. We have read the testimony; we are convinced one way or the other. We say he did this or he did that. Does he come in and rise up and interrupt me and say, "You are mistaken, Senator; here is the truth about it"? Under similar circumstances I would have remained here and tried to correct any errors if any Senator had misrepresented the facts in my case. I would have helped all I could to exonerate myself and prove my title clear to a seat in this body. But what does he do? He sits back and says nothing. "Mr. Fred Smith, was that money the joint fund of Mr. Truman Newberry and John Newberry?" "Yes, sir; and of all the other Newberrys." "You checked on it?" "I did." Then, we say that Senator Newberry knew about that; he was bound to know about it; but he does not come in here and say we are mistaken; not once.

What does he say in conclusion? His lawyers conclude his presentation of the case by saying, "We have no apology to make for anything we have done." What do you think of that, Senators? You know, to my mind, it shows contempt for this body. I never thought the day would come when any man, Democrat or Republican, could walk through this Chamber, rattle his gold coin, and get by without some sort of personal investigation when he is charged with corrupting voters and making barter of a seat in this honored body.

What do you suppose a jury would do if they knew that a fellow had gone through three or four courts and had finally come to them, and one of the jurors should say, "Let us bring him in here; I want to interrogate him; this is a very serious matter to him and to us and the country," and they were to come back and say, "He declines to come in; he will not testify"? I know what the honest juror would say. He would say: "Men, this fellow acts like he is guilty. He knows that it will not do to get on the witness stand. He dreads to be questioned."

Why, take this case in Michigan. Paul King went into the court up there with his prepared story. He told it to the court, and just when the lawyers on the other side got ready to cross-examine him, Paul threw up his hands and said, "I am sick." He left the courtroom, and cross-examination was not permitted, and nobody who favored honest elections and clean titles in this body got the opportunity to ask him one question. Mr. Newberry's manager got sick and would not let anyone ask him any questions, and Mr. Newberry himself would not appear to be questioned at all. He was as silent as the tomb.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator, I am sure, would not misinterpret the testimony; and I would not, if I could avoid it, permit anything to go into the record—even if it militated against Mr. NEWBERRY, who I think should be unseated—unless the facts warranted it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Sure. I will thank my friend for any correction.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me to correct just one statement which he made, the record does show, as stated by the Senator from Alabama, that Paul King claimed to be ill, and probably was, after he had submitted certain testimony in the trial court. He was, however, as I recall, examined by some of the Senators, probably by some of the minority Senators, when he appeared before the Senate committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is correct. I did not mean to say that he did not testify here, because I quoted from his testimony; but I meant that up there they did not get an opportunity to question him at all.

I quoted Paul King in another speech here, saying in his testimony before the Senate committee that he kept Mr. Newberry informed as to what was going on in the senatorial campaign. This of itself is enough to connect and bind Mr. Newberry.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, in the interest of accuracy let me say—because the record shows it—that the acting chairman heckled and hindered in every way possible any kind of effort to pin Paul King down to statements where he wanted to evade, and repeatedly said, "The committee is not interested in that question."

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the testimony as printed in the record bears out the conclusion that my friend from Arkansas has drawn. I was impressed that way myself when I read the testimony. It looked like an effort to shield Mr. Newberry. I do not want to do any injustice to anybody, but there seemed to me from beginning to end to be a disposition to shield this man and protect him rather than have him or his friends come out and make a clean breast of the whole case. That is what disgusts me, Mr. President.

I want to say before I sit down that this case ought to be tried without regard to whether Mr. Newberry is a Republican or a Democrat. I want to say this to the Senators on the other side who have made up their minds to cast their lot with him, and to go with him, whether out of this Chamber or not finally, and I think they will. I think the man who votes to seat him here votes at the same time to unseat himself, and it ought to be so. Senators, you can not be too particular about this money proposition. There are a great many men in this country who think, when they accumulate a little money and get a good-sized "wad," as they call it, that they ought to enter politics. That was not the rule in the old days. They said then: "What manner of man is he? Is he a man of ability? Is he a man of honor and integrity? Is he a man trained in the art of statecraft? Does he understand anything about the science of government? Would he make an able and a faithful Senator?" Now they want us to descend so low in the scale of being that we will only ask, "How much money has he?" And the fellow who has made a lot of money says, "I think I will go into politics. Send down for these political tradesmen and ask them what it will cost me to buy a seat in the Senate." In the Newberry case they said, "Why, Hayden is the man you want." So Cody came down here, and Hayden said, "I do not want to have anything to do with it." Then they said, "We know where there is a man—Paul King. He is a smooth artist. He was with the Taft faction, while you, Mr. Newberry, were with the Roosevelt faction in 1912, and if we can get Paul King over we will have done a big day's work. Of course it will cost a good deal of money." "Go bring Paul to me"; and they brought Paul to New York, and Paul appeared to Mr. Newberry—not in a dream, but in reality—and the first question Newberry asked Paul King was, "How much will it cost?"

What is the first thing a man asks when he goes to an auction where they are going to sell a mule or a horse or a fine Jersey cow? He says, "I like the looks of that one over there. How much will it cost me?" They tell him in the neighborhood of about what it will cost, and he says: "Count me in the running"; and he stands and bids in this matter of barter, and purchases a commodity at the auction block. Newberry referred to these seats, honored by Webster and Clay and Calhoun and Morgan and Voorhees and Cullom, able and distinguished Democrats and Republicans, who served their country faithfully and well: "How much will it cost me to get in that body?" "Well, it will cost you about $50,000, maybe upward of $50,000." Then what happened? "Go!" Paul went back, and he entered the field as Mr. Newberry's manager. How much did he expend? We trailed down and they admit expending four times $50,000, or $200,000.

What did Mr. Newberry write to Paul King when they suggested that he get out of the race? He said: "I am in to a finish, and when I go into a thing I want to accomplish it." What else did he say to Paul? In substance: "If you will keep our publicity going at full pressure, we will keep anybody else out of the race." What did that "full pressure" mean? Dollars—hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands. Newspapers? Yes.

MY DEAR MR. NEWBERRY—

Listen to Paul King—

We have now 201 newspapers actively supporting you, and I am going out after the other 300.

O Senators, Senators, I repeat what I said here before: I would love to try this case before a precinct jury and a justice of the peace! I would not have any doubt about the verdict there.

I do not know what influences are at work here, but they are at work as surely as you live and I live and God reigns. Lawyers have been employed at big fees to come here and defend this contest. They know the situation, and never once did they rise up and ask to bring in their man Newberry and let him testify.

Senators, one time in Kentucky old James Garnett—known to my good friend Senator STANLEY as a great prosecuting attorney—was prosecuting a murder case, and the lawyer on the other side rambled around the hillside and out in the mountain ranges like the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] did here to-day, and old James Garnett made a very short speech, and closed by saying:

Gentlemen of the jury, stripping this case of all the misleading and confusing things that have been injected into it by the attorney on the other side, this man is guilty of murder.

That is the situation here. I can sum it up in a nutshell. Stripping this case of all the smoke screens that have been thrown over and around it, of hatred for Henry Ford—and Henry Ford is entirely out of it, for if we deny Newberry a seat Ford will not be seated—stripping this case of all smoke screens brought in here to hide the facts, this man is guilty of buying a seat in the Senate of the United States. Am I going to sanction the sale? So help me, God, I will not! I hope, when the vote is finally had, that it will be unanimous in favor of unseating him and in favor of protecting the honor and integrity of the Senate.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] can not come in here with any of his little chickadee-dee, sleight-of-hand performance and get away from the hard, cold facts in this case.

Senators, the Senator from New Hampshire misquoted the figures about my State. He said, as I understood him, that we had about 50,000 more Negro men than white men in Alabama. The census of the population shows that we have 1,407,000 whites, 900,000 blacks, and 490,000 of all others. We have more whites, as I said at the outset, than we have Negroes. I give these figures to show you how misleading was his statement about my State. I repeat that we are doing our very best to solve the race problem in the right way. The Senator from New Hampshire ought to give us his sympathy in solving that problem, rather than stand here and make political horseplay out of what we are doing and trying to do with one of the most serious problems that confront the American people.

God Almighty has a climax in everything. He has it in the moon, sun, and stars. The stars and the planets float in the wide arch above us, the moon reflects the glory of the sun, but all of them are held in place by the majesty and the power of the sun. In the beasts of the field there is a climax and a ruling spirit, and that is the lion. In the fowls of the air there is a climax. The owl has a beak and talons just like the eagle, and so has the hawk, but the eagle is the king of all fowls. He kindles his eye in the morning sun and bathes his plumage in the thunder's home. There are four races—black, yellow, red, and white—and the white man is the climax and crowning glory of God's creation, and wherever he establishes his sovereignty he will at any cost maintain it as long as God lets him live. He is God's chosen instrument to rule this country. He is the dominating power—master spirit in the Republic—and all other bodies are held in place by his majesty and power.

Let the Senator from New Hampshire join with me from Alabama; let the Senators from the other sections vie with each other as to who can contribute most to good government and to the strength and solidarity of the American Union. Let us work together, solving these great problems as best we can, not hampering or hindering one section or the other, but working together for the good of each and each for the good of all.

I submit, before taking my seat, that, occupying a seat once honored by John T. Morgan, of Alabama, later by John H. Bankhead of my State, there is no service I could render of a higher order than to vote to safeguard the rights and liberties of the American people and protect the honor and integrity of the Senate by voting against the sale of seats in this body. There is no vote that I will cast while I serve in this body which I can call to the attention of my boy with more pride and satisfaction in the years to come than the vote that I shall cast to unseat Mr. Newberry, and in doing so help to safeguard the rights and liberties of the whole American people, protect the honor and integrity of the Senate, and keep faith with the boys who fought for and yet live and their comrades who died for the flag in France.

Mr. PITTMAN subsequently said:

Mr. President, I was absent from the Senate for a few minutes to-day while the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] was addressing the Senate on a matter rather foreign to the subject before the Senate, and rather reflecting upon my former colleague from the State of Nevada, and a former Member of this body, Senator Henderson. I have read the report of that portion of his remarks.

It is not my purpose at this time to answer the Senator. His remarks were more of a reflection upon the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] than they were upon the former Senator from the State of Nevada. The Senator from Ohio, who is now absent on official business, out of the United States, will be back in a few days, and I have no doubt he will be able in a proper manner to reply to the unjust and unnecessary criticism of the Senator from New Hampshire.

I want to say this, however, that the Senator bases his criticism of the former Senator from Nevada upon a letter written by a lady who was an independent candidate for the election to the Senate in the campaign of 1918. That letter is in the record, having been placed in the record by the Senator from New Hampshire. It does not contain the statement of any facts whatever which would justify the charge made in the letter, that this lady believed that Senator Henderson had spent a large sum of money in that campaign. It is the unsworn statement of a defeated candidate, unsupported by facts.

The reply of Senator POMERENE, who was then chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, disclosed the fact that he immediately requested Miss Martin to submit any evidence to the committee which she possessed touching her charge. There was a letter from Miss Martin stating that on the following day she would send the evidence in her possession. The speech of the Senator from New Hampshire does not disclose whether or not that evidence ever reached the committee, but the insinuation is made that in his opinion he believes it reached there, and that it has been removed from the committee through some improper means.

That took place in January, 1919, and in March, 1919, the Republican majority came into control of that committee, with eight members to the Democratic five members. It seems to me that during the time that a Republican majority were in charge of that committee, if it had been possible to make any bona fide charge against Senator Henderson on account of excessive expenditures of money, or other grounds affecting his right to sit in this Chamber, they would not have remained quiet during the period of two years that Senator Henderson was a Member of this body, and would not have waited until after he had ceased to be a Member and then have permitted some individual Senator to cast an insinuation against the absent Senator, who has ceased to be a Member of this body, based upon the flimsy charges which the Senator from New Hampshire has placed in the RECORD.

Senator Henderson stands high in the State of Nevada. No man ever stood higher, or stands higher to-day. His honor and integrity were never questioned in that State. The Republican State central committee of the State of Nevada never supported the letter from Miss Martin which has been placed in the record. The National Republican committee never supported the letter written by Miss Martin, and Miss Martin, during the two years' time that the opposition party was in power in this body, and in power in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, either never attempted to bring her matter up, or the Republican majority in charge of the committee would not let her bring it up.

I know that the Republican majority in the committee would have brought it up if Miss Martin had urged that it be brought up. The facts stand that there is an insinuation made against a man who stood high in this body, and who stands high in his own State, on a flimsy letter that has been written; that the charges made and the insinuations made against this Senator, without excuse and without justification, tend to blacken his name and his record in this body, were made solely for the purpose of defending some other Senator who is charged with a similar offense.

I think that the Senator from New Hampshire, when he reads his own record, will be ashamed of it, and I hope to see him get up on the floor of the Senate, when he has had time to think of this, and apologize for reflecting upon a former brother Senator in the manner in which he has done it.

I would go into the record of this case and elaborate on it, but I am not a member, and never have been a member, of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I know that Senator POMERENE, who was chairman of the committee at that time, and is still a member of that committee, although not chairman, will answer the Senator from New Hampshire, as a member of that committee, with a full knowledge of all of the facts, and will brand the insinuations cast particularly against him in the only way that he can brand it in this Chamber.

Mr. HARRIS subsequently said:

Mr. President, I am sorry to take the time of the Senate, but it is necessary in order to reply to certain misstatements made to-day by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I had hoped that the Senate would dispose of the deficiency appropriation bill at an earlier hour so that I might not interrupt its consideration.

The Senator from New Hampshire in discussing the Newberry case referred to my election, which had no bearing on the subject under discussion. He stated that—

Even with the mighty aid of Woodrow Wilson and all of the administration forces Gov. Hardwick was hardly defeated.

Mr. President, that is about as near the truth as the Senator's statements usually are when he becomes excited and allows partisan feeling to destroy his judgment. Members of the Senate who serve with him know that he is utterly reckless in his statements and we pay no attention to them, but the country does not understand that, and for that reason I must correct the misstatements he has made.

The Senator from New Hampshire said that Mr. Hardwick was hardly defeated. The fact is that in Georgia we vote under the county unit system, and I carried 114 counties, while Mr. Hardwick carried 17.

In regard to President Wilson's part in this campaign, we know that during the war Senator Hardwick was not supporting President Wilson's recommendations, which many thought was necessary to win the war. He was then Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Our country was at war, and we know that President Wilson's indorsement of me had good effect on my campaign; but when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] says that all the administration forces were at work for me he makes another statement which is not true. Many of the most influential Federal officeholders in my State supported one of the other four candidates, among them the collector of internal revenue of the State of Georgia.

The postmaster of Atlanta, the largest city in our State; the United States district attorney and the United States marshal for the northern district of Georgia—any number of President Wilson's appointees opposed me for election, and no effort was made by President Wilson to influence them to support me.

After the first speech I made I wired my campaign manager not to accept one dollar of contribution from any man employed by the Government or anyone who was interested in any Government contract. My campaign manager, Dr. L. S. Ledbetter, is a man of the highest sense of honor and had never before taken part in the management of a political campaign. He has the respect and confidence of everyone in the State who knows him, and I know that he carried out my instructions. He is one of the best men I ever knew.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to deny other misstatements made by the Senator from New Hampshire, but I would like to say that during the campaign I, through the newspapers and in all my speeches, offered to show all my campaign contributions to the public and asked all the other candidates to do likewise.

Mr. President, there are many Senators who will vote to seat Senator Newberry, and I have the greatest respect for those who differ with me, but I do not believe there is one of them, except Senator MOSES, who would make such misstatements about the election of Senators from Alabama, Kentucky, Nevada, Georgia, and other States. Senator MOSES's animosity toward former President Wilson is well known, but he should not deliberately make misstatements of facts as to the election of Senators because they supported President Wilson while he was in office. Even when President Wilson was seriously ill from overwork in trying to win the war Senator MOSES made a false statement about the President's condition, of which, I think, any other Member of this body would have been ashamed. There were many other Senators who differed with President Wilson, as Senator MOSES did, but they did not stoop to such methods.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] knows that a Republican judge and jury in Michigan convicted Senator Newberry and several others connected with his campaign, and there are thousands of Republicans in that State who disapproved of such methods. The evidence in this case, I think, speaks for itself. It is admitted that they spent about $200,000 in the primary. It is most unfortunate for the Senate, as well as the State of New Hampshire, which has such an able and conscientious Senator in Mr. KEYES, that Senator MOSES can not discuss any question on its merits, but must make a partisan matter of every question. I had hoped that extreme partisanship was a thing of the past. I had hoped never to take part in a partisan debate, but when Senator MOSES makes a statement about my election which was far from the truth I feel compelled to state the facts. Georgia has never had an election which disgraced our State. You can not buy the people of Georgia, and the Senator from New Hampshire can not reflect on my State as long as I am a Member of this body without my stating the facts as I know them.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The Secretary will proceed to read the pending deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, after the admonition of the Senator from Wyoming, I rise to occupy the time of the Senate with some embarrassment. I do not desire to delay the consideration of the deficiency bill, and I promise to be brief, and if the Senator from Wyoming needs a quorum, I will stay here until he gets the bill through.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say, since this subject and others which lead to discussion have been brought up, that I shall endeavor to have this bill proceeded with and kept before the Senate, and I hope all those who have entertained us with speeches will remain until we finish the consideration of the bill. I say that now, so that it may be understood that I shall attempt to have the bill passed during the day, on account of the stress under which we are laboring.

WORK OF CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it has been a little over a year since the resolution was introduced in this body asking the President to call a disarmament conference. It is now just a month since the conference convened. No one appreciates more than I the work which the conference has done in reference to the subject of disarmament. The proposition submitted by the Secretary of State upon the convening of the conference, the manner in which it was presented, and the boldness of the program should meet with the highest commendation of all people who are interested in that cause or in the cause of peace generally. It was a splendid beginning. I doubt if a conference international in its nature ever convened which began its program so propitiously or promisingly as the conference known now as the Washington conference. I will not be considered as fulsome when I say the manner of its opening and the presentation of the program placed the Secretary of State of the United States among the great premiers and secretaries of state of history.

As I stated, the conference has now been in session about a month, and we are advised that, in all probability, in a very short time, since the presentation of the treaty upon Saturday, the conference will close. That is the justification for the remarks which I am going to make; that it may not be said hereafter that I did not speak at a time when possibly what I had to say might have been listened to in other places. I do not want to be estopped hereafter by silence at this time.

Up until this time the conference has not dealt with the weapons of war with which the next war will be fought, in case it should come. It was of tremendous moment that the cessation of the building of battleships should become an established fact, but in my opinion that relates more particularly to the question of economy. It has been my opinion for months, based upon the advice of the great experts of the English and the American navies, that the battleship is either obsolete or obsolescent, and that the part which it will play in the next great conflict, if we be so unfortunate as to have one, will be a most inconsequential and unimportant part. The real weapons of war, those weapons which the experts touching this subject seem to agree will be the instruments with which the next war will be carried on, apparently have not yet come to the consideration of the conference, at least in a practical way. Of course, in saying that, I realize that after the first few hours of the conference the doors were closed and we may not be thoroughly advised as to just what has taken place; but if we are correctly informed through the news items these subjects have not as yet been touched. The only matter which has been dealt with is that of the destruction of a certain number of battleships and the cessation of building others.

In this connection, as some justification for the conclusion which I have drawn with reference to the value of a battleship in modern warfare, I read a statement which is accredited to Admiral Sims, made only a few days ago, in which he said:

> The battleship is no longer the backbone of the Navy. The battleship has no defense against airplanes and no offensive power against airplane carriers which have speed enough to keep away.

Whatever credit may, therefore, be justly given to the conference for dealing with this particular phase of naval preparation, I feel that it would be very discouraging if the treaty concerning disarmament, which is ultimately to be sent to the Senate for ratification, should include nothing more than the program which has thus far been presented. We would have destroyed some ships which it would have been our duty to destroy anyway, as a matter of economy. We would have destroyed some ships, as Great Britain had already destroyed a number, a thing not of very much consequence. We would have ceased to build ships, which is a matter, I concede, of very great consequence; but we would not have touched at all the control or elimination of those weapons with which the next war will be fought.

Take, for illustration, the submarine. It would seem from the conference's proceedings up to this time that there is no intention of dealing with that in the manner with which, in the name of civilization and of peace, it ought to be dealt. The submarine is not a weapon of civilized warfare. It is the instrument with which men prey upon noncombatants, nonbelligerents, upon commerce. Its highest achievement is signified in such horrors as the sinking of the Lusitania. It is a barbarous, inhuman, and murderous weapon of the sea, a means of assassination, and not of civilized warfare. However much we therefore may have accomplished in the matter of economy, there would be no evidence at all that these four great naval powers propose to disable themselves or to limit themselves in the real methods of barbarous warfare should the time come for them to engage in such a thing.

We are in position now, it seems to me, not only to limit the number of submarines which may be constructed, to limit the number which each nation may build, but we are in a position, if we have faith in what we are doing, and in the leagues and alliances which we are forming, to eliminate them and banish them from the sea entirely.

It is within the power of the three, or four at most, great nations here assembled to establish the rule of the sea, to free it in time of war, as well as in time of peace, of these instruments, which, at the time they were first brought to our attention, were universally denounced by all the world as outside the pale of civilized warfare. There is no other nation to dispute the program, either in fact or in design, and should we leave this matter untouched and unconsidered we will have left in the hands of the great naval powers of the world the most barbarous instrument known to sea warfare. Why? For whom?

It has been proposed in the conference, as I understand, by one of the powers that some consideration be taken of this matter. I am perfectly aware that this proposal, coming from the source from which it comes, is calculated to excite the suspicion or arouse the fears of certain people. It might be thought there may be some sinister or ulterior motive behind the suggestion. It seems to me, however, that we ought not to permit such matters to enter into our consideration. If a proposal has been made which inherently is in the cause of peace, which will promote the cause of disarmament, we should be so free of those things as to judge of it from its inherent worth, and not to condemn it by reason of the source from which the suggestion has come. Perhaps the most astonishing feature of the whole submarine discussion has come from the fact that another great nation seems to oppose the proposition; that is France. Of course, it would be highly improper for me to criticize the course of any country represented at the conference. It can not be considered, however, improper to consider fairly any proposition which has been submitted, because this body undoubtedly will have to pass upon it before it is finally consummated.

There is no nation in the world outside of the four nations here assembled of whom any one of them need have any fear. In other words, the fear must arise, if it exists, against or concerning some one of the four great nations assembled. It seems incredible to me that France and Great Britain, lately engaged in a struggle for their preservation, should have any fear concerning their relationship for any reasonable length of time in the future. They were allies in the great struggle, and in addition to that they are both members of what is known as the League of Nations, associated together in an effort to promote peace, as they contend this organization is calculated to do. In addition to that, they are now members of an alliance known as the Pacific alliance.

Mr. President, if the League of Nations and the alliance are organized for the purpose of promoting peace and the organizers believe and trust in them, it would seem there can be no possible reason why this barbarous instrument of warfare should not be eliminated and banished entirely from the sea. In other words, to leave it is to cast doubt and fear and suspicion and plant them all in the very heart of the movement for disarmament. It notifies every nation in the world and the people of the nations that the faith of those nations here assembled is not strong in the cause in which they are engaged.

My idea of disarmament is that we can take some of the risk with reference to disarmament that we take with reference to war. Some one might argue that it is not safe or in exact harmony with the ideas of security that the United States should deprive itself of the right to build submarines, but unless a great nation like the United States is willing to exhibit its faith and have its faith tested in this cause we had just as well cease to call disarmament conferences. If we have faith in France, in Great Britain, and in Japan, there is no possible reason why we should keep this instrument on the sea. If we have no such faith, this entire proposition is but a delusion. In other words, by failing to deal with this subject we renounce our faith in the movement so splendidly started. Not a single one of the instruments which were condemned during the war as hideous and barbarous—submarines or poison gas or any of that class of weapons—are to be touched; they are to be left as the instruments with which these four great powers are in the future to conduct war in case they shall fight either among themselves or against anyone else. In what respect have we discouraged war? In what respect have we manifested our faith in peace? In what respect have we discredited force as the real security upon which nations are still to rely?

I trust, therefore, Mr. President, that before the treaty dealing with the subject of disarmament reaches this body it will have included in it a prohibition against the use of the submarine and a prohibition against its manufacture or its building. It is said that it is the defense of small nations. What security could a small nation enjoy from the number of submarines which it could construct as against the naval power or the capacity to build submarines of the four great naval nations, or any one of them, here assembled? What possible security could a small nation enjoy either in the number which they could build or the manner in which they could make use of them as against these great naval powers?

It is not in my judgment the interest in the small nation. It is because they are not quite willing to rest their faith in the cause of disarmament to the extent of embarrassing themselves to any considerable degree in case another war comes. And by such a course the next war is assured.

Now, Mr. President, to illustrate the extent to which we shall have traveled in the cause of disarmament when the conference closes, if we go no further than we have in this movement, let me call your attention to a clause in the treaty which has been proposed and which we shall be called upon to ratify. This is known as a four-power treaty. I am frank to say that the extent and vigor of my opposition to this treaty will be determined very largely by what the conference does with reference to real disarmament and by what it does with reference to China. In this proposed treaty is the following clause:

If the said rights are threatened—

That is, the rights of any one of those four nations—

by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken jointly or separately to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

In case the rights of any of the parties are assailed, rights of any character, territorial integrity or any other right which they shall possess within the territory defined, they shall confer fully and frankly as to what measures they shall take either jointly or separately.

Now, Mr. President, what does that clause 2 mean? It might be a very harmless proposition under some circumstances, but suppose there is an aggression which invokes the existence of another conference under this clause, who will assemble? Japan, Great Britain, France, and the United States. If the conference adjourns with its present program, what will be the military standing of that conference when it assembles? Those four nations will represent the only naval power upon the earth. They will have under the program 40 battleships, all the submarines which they see fit to construct, the airplanes, and the other equipment which constitutes a navy, which will constitute a navy the like of which the human mind never dreamed of before. Assembled in the Pacific Ocean there will be an armada compared with which the Spanish Armada was an insignificant affair.

But that is not all. Represented there in the same conference will be practically all the land military power that is worth while in the world—France, representing her 800,000 or 1,000,000 army, with her military alliance with Belgium, her military alliance with Poland, with Poland's 450,000 army; Japan, with her army; Great Britain, with her army; and the United States, with her army. Those powers will assemble in this conference under this clause, representing the greatest naval and land armament yet known to history.

It is said that there is no military force lurking anywhere in and about this treaty. I grant you that in the language itself it is not provided for, and you seldom find an alliance or a league in which it is provided for. No one would have the temerity in this day and age of the world to write any such thing into a league or a treaty. But I invite your attention to the practical carrying out of article 2, and that is that it means the assembling of the armed forces of the four great powers of the world. I grant you also that they could assemble and not make use of that power, but if an aggression had been made and they did assemble and did not make use of it, it would be the first time in the history of the world that any such thing ever happened.

Mr. President, alliances and leagues and understandings and associations of nations organized for the purpose of peace, organized in the interest of peace, become a league for war, an association for war, in accordance with the military condition or status of those who are members of it. League covenants, associations, and understandings are construed one way when vast armaments are at hand and another after armaments have been put aside. As Gen. Smuts has said, if the arms are at hand, men will use them. An "aggression" would be met instantly and crushingly if those assailed had at their command 40 battleships, a herd of hideous submarines, and 2,000,000 men, as these four nations would have. Anyone who would expect peaceful methods under such circumstances would be regarded as an enemy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that a quadruple alliance has greater possibilities for war and international discord than a world league?

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to compare the two. I may do that later. I only wish to urge what I rose to urge, and that is that unless there is real disarmament this must inevitably be a military alliance and nothing else—a determination to overawe and dominate the Pacific by force.

Why, Mr. President, let us contemplate for a moment the situation. Let us suppose this treaty is ratified; let us suppose that we go out of here with 22 battleships for Great Britain, 18 for the United States, 10 for Japan, and a certain number for France—I do not know just what, but not very important so far as the naval part of it is concerned. Let us assume that the armed forces by land continue as they are. Then let us assume that Russia and China combined, or Russia or China or any other nation or combination of nations should attack one of the islands covered by this contract or undertaking and invade it or take possession of it. Suppose that the conference were convened to deal with that matter. It is very true that they are not under obligation to use armed force, but no man will deny that they have the power under that contract to commit us to such a course. When I say "commit" I do not mean that they could legally bind the Congress of the United States to send an army, but when I say "commit" I mean precisely what the former President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, said with reference to article 10 of the League of Nations, that the moral obligation would be commanding and more binding than the legal obligation itself. If our representatives in that conference vote in favor of meeting the aggression by force and they determine there in secret conference—and it will be secret, if we judge the future by the past—to bring out of that secret conference an obligation or an agreement that force is the only method by which the contingency can successfully be dealt with, what will be the position of the Congress of the United States in regard to it?

We will either have to comply with the agreement which has been reached or the whole compact goes to pieces the moment we do not do so. In other words, the judgment of the men there assembled either binds us or it does not—not legally; I am not now speaking of its legal effect, because I have never contended in this debate that by a treaty we could change the Constitution of the United States so as to take away the formality of Congress providing for the Army.

So I get back to the proposition which I wish to stress today, and that is that this alliance makes it absolutely necessary that real disarmament take place, or else it becomes nothing in the world but a military alliance by which the Pacific is to be controlled by the four great military powers of the world. If there were such disarmament as reasonably to assure the world that the nations interested would prefer to resort to arbitration or other methods of settlement, one might consistently argue that this would not be a dangerous treaty for the United States to enter; but without real disarmament it would mean to me nothing but a military alliance, the same as the Anglo-Japanese alliance. I desire to read some of the provisions of the Anglo-Japanese alliance:

The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and India—

That is, this is one of the objects of the treaty of alliance—

(b) The preservation of the common interests of all powers in China by insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire and the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations in China.

(c) For the maintenance of the territorial rights of the high contracting parties in the regions of eastern Asia and of India and in defense of their special interests in said regions.

ARTICLE I. It is agreed that whenever, in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan, any of the rights and interests referred to in the preamble of this agreement are in jeopardy the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests.

There is no difference so far as substance is concerned in that proposition and this, except some immaterial change of language. In other words, this is the Anglo-Japanese alliance with two other members.

If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other high contracting party will at once come to the assistance of its ally and will conduct the war in common and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Idaho find anything in the agreement which has just been reported from the arms conference to the effect of the last clause of the British-Japanese alliance he has just read, wherein one party agrees to come to the assistance of the other in case it becomes involved in war?

Mr. BORAH. Not specifically in language, but the terms of article 2 permits just that course, and unless such course is pursued the treaty is meaningless and worthless.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That may be, but that does not answer the question as to what the obligations created by the instrument are.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I find that an instrument creates a situation, which situation compels me to take a certain course, it is immaterial to me that the language is not found in the instrument which compels me to take that certain course. I am not going to be blinded here by language which puts the United States in a situation where it can only take one course or act in dishonor. I had infinitely rather see the contract upon its face define what should be done.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator desire to ask another question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was merely going to suggest in the same connection that there is another very radical difference between the instruments, in that the one—that is, the British-Japanese agreement—is universal in its application to all of the international affairs of the two parties; that is, one party agrees to go to the assistance of the other in case of war arising from any cause which can be construed as an aggression upon any of its interests, whereas the agreement just reported from the arms conference is limited to controversies relating to the island possessions and dominions of the several parties.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so; and just imagine starting a war in the Pacific by those four powers which would not include every nation on earth. If there were a controversy in the Pacific in which these nations should be brought into controversy or with reference to which a war should occur, it would inevitably spread to all corners of the earth, because those four powers will, when they assemble there, represent practically all of the military and naval power of the world, and their interests and possessions are in every quarter of the globe.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. On that point I venture to call attention to the fact that the World War started over the killing of a single individual in a little country in Europe, and from that beginning spread all over the world. The man who thinks that if war should occur about an island lying a few miles from the coast such a war would be confined to that island has a strange conception of the way in which wars are originated and the manner in which they are carried on.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the trouble about the remarks of the Senator from Missouri in this connection is that he seems to assume that the limitation of this agreement to controversies arising about the island possessions or island dominions of the several powers increases the chances of war. My view of it is that it rather diminishes the chances of war, and is in line with the purpose of the agreement to avoid the causes of war and possibly to avoid war. Of course, I agree with the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Idaho that if the parties become involved in war for any cause it will involve their entire interests; but that is rather aside from the question.

Mr. REED. The Senator will hardly contend that even if the cause of war were one growing out of the islands of the sea we do not increase our liability when we consider that we have practically no island possessions except the Philippines, which we ought to give up, and that Japan and England have together, either by previous acquisition or by acquisition achieved through the treaty of Versailles, seized every island in the Pacific Ocean, Japan taking those north of the Equator and Great Britain taking those south; and that when we enter into this arrangement, if it means anything at all, we become involved the moment any of those island possessions are assailed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not interrupt me again, because I want to conclude. I know the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is justly impatient of the situation.

When interrupted I was calling attention to the Anglo-Japanese alliance with a specific object in view, rather than for the purpose of comparing it with the instrument emanating from the Conference on Limitation of Armament, although the similarity between the two in some respects is very marked. It will be observed, however, that one of the objects of the Anglo-Japanese alliance was the preservation of the common interests of all the powers in China by insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire. Now, my friends, take down a map of China as it existed in 1905, at the time when the Anglo-Japanese treaty was first signed, and then take a map of China and look at it as it is to-day under the protection of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. I am not here to criticize the nations which have acted under the Anglo-Japanese alliance, but I call attention to the fact that we are asked to sign a treaty with the same principle embodied in it, and China is not deemed worthy of being considered or being asked to attach her signature to the treaty. It becomes a vestibule for the exploitation of China, if there are any nations there which see fit to engage in that kind of an enterprise. We had our contract or treaty or agreement with Korea, to which we paid no attention when the hour came to discharge our obligations and duties; and under the Anglo-Japanese alliance the rights of China have diminished and her territorial integrity has been encroached upon from day to day. So I say, Mr. President, it does not turn upon the wording of the treaty as to the military equipment of the respective powers which sign the treaty. A solemn promise in the Anglo-Japanese treaty to protect China has been so construed as to accomplish the very opposite. What will be the fate of China, judging the future by the past, if a similar spirit prevails upon the part of the signers of this treaty? Our protest might be recorded; so might it have been in the case of Korea, but it was not. This treaty could well become the smoke screen under which the dividing up of China, so ambitiously begun, could be completed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is there anything in this proposed agreement that imposes any obligation or provides for any action on the part of the United States that the United States ought not to take in the course of good conduct toward the world, even though we had no such agreement as that?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think I caught the Senator's drift.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will state it a little more specifically. Is any obligation imposed on the United States by this agreement that does not already exist—assuming, of course, that it is an obligation on the part of a great nation which desires to preserve comity and friendship among nations and peace in the world—to confer with neighboring powers about its own interests and their interests which are the subject of a controversy leading to war? That is all that this agreement provides for.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am rather of opinion that the Senator was not in the Chamber during the first part of my remarks. I said at the time that my attitude ultimately toward this matter, whether aggressive or otherwise, depends very largely upon whether or not real disarmament takes place here in this Washington conference. I know, and the Senator knows, from every page of history that has been recorded, that three out of four nations assembled together, when called upon to act in regard to an aggression, if they are armed to the teeth, will act through armed methods. Arbitration does not take place under any such circumstances. If the nations will disarm to the extent that I think they ought to disarm, I would concede what the Senator says to be true, that they might meet there and arbitrate a question or settle it according to peaceful means.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This agreement does not provide for arbitration.

Mr. BORAH. I know that. It does not provide for anything.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It merely provides for good offices.

Mr. BORAH. No; it does not provide for good offices. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As I understand, there is nothing provided for in this agreement which was not done, as a matter of fact, by all of the allied nations at the outbreak of the great German war. In other words, England and France and also the United States under the leadership of President Wilson, as I understood, exhausted every possible remedy to avoid going into war. In fact, President Wilson was very severely criticized for writing notes and hesitating and procrastinating and multiplying the means by which he sought to adjust the differences between Germany and the United States and the abuses that arose out of the conduct of the German Government rather than redress our grievances by a show of force. That was done without any agreement, so it seems to me that the writing of a policy of that kind into this agreement changes very little the situation as between these nations.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, this treaty does not amount to anything, one way or the other.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; that is not the conclusion I draw. I think it amounts to a great deal.

Mr. BORAH. If it does not impose any obligation upon us except that which we already have, or if it is not calculated to inspire us to do anything but what we would do anyhow, I do not see how it amounts to anything.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It amounts to something in this way, as I see it: If the Philippines, for instance, should be menaced—in order to speak frankly and plainly—here we have a written understanding, an express understanding, that Great Britain will use her good offices and her influence to prevent an attack upon the Philippines.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I will read this proposed agreement over again while the Senator from Arkansas is propounding his question. I have never seen anything of that kind in it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask the Senator from Washington a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not the Senator from Washington think that the proposed agreement—that in case these rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other nation the high contracting parties shall consult fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately—implies the use of force in the event the rights are violated by any other than the four contracting powers? And if he does not think so, why were not specific methods prescribed?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In my opinion, specific methods are prescribed. This is the language of the proposed agreement:

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I quoted the language of article 2 literally, with the exception of the last clause, and I refrained from doing it in the hope that the Senator from Washington would express his interpretation of its meaning—"to meet the exigencies of the particular situation." It contemplates the existence of an emergency. It is an agreement or an undertaking between these four powers to stand together for the preservation of their rights, and, in case an attempt is made to violate them by the aggressive action of any other power, to confer together and decide upon the best means of protecting those rights. That is exactly what "meeting the exigencies of the particular situation" means. It can mean nothing else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is what it says. Now, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me carry my question a little further. Suppose the aggressor in the violation of these rights, as defined by the treaty, should appear with a navy in a harbor of one of the islands. What does the Senator from Washington think would be the inevitable result of this agreement?

Mr. REED. What would be "the most efficient measures"?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. "The most efficient measures" for carrying out the agreement undoubtedly would be the application of force.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What does the Senator from Arkansas think would be "the most efficient measures," or what would the parties who would be responsible for the conduct of the several nations at that particular juncture in their affairs think would be "the most efficient measures"?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will tell the Senator from Washington in a very few words. I think when these four powers assembled, if it were Japan whose possessions were assailed, they would say: "Japan, can you take care of this situation? If not, we will assist you in doing it, as our obligation plainly binds us to do."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Washington to this feature of the matter, which is another illustration partially suggested by the Senator from Arkansas:

Suppose naval vessels should appear in one of the harbors of the islands in a threatening way, and suppose these four nations should assemble, and suppose the representatives of these four nations there in conference should determine that the most efficient measures for dealing with the situation were for each of the four different nations to furnish a certain amount of naval force. While, as I say, I do not contend that a treaty could be made which would take away from the Congress what I will call the formality of authorizing it, yet under this treaty we would be bound to send that force as a moral proposition, just the same as we would under article 10 of the League of Nations covenant.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the Senator's opinion and construction of this language, which is entirely different from mine. I do not read anything in the language which has been repeated here which deprives either one of the parties to it of its independence of action.

Mr. BORAH. I agree to that perfectly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Furthermore, in the situation the Senator from Idaho has described, you are confronted with actual war. The assembling of a hostile fleet and the menace and gesture of attack—which, I assume, he includes in the imaginary case that he is citing—would be an act of war. It would be a hostile act, and the only remedy upon which any self-respecting nation would rely under those circumstances would be an adequate naval power of its own to resist it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator takes exactly the position that I do. Article 2 of this proposed treaty does not provide for anything except aggression. That is all it provides for. If the aggression takes place, it is a hostile demonstration, and when it takes place you will meet it, if you have the navy and the army, in the same way; and that is precisely what I contend for.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator in the suggestion made a moment ago that this agreement does not compel us to act with the other nations; but it does obligate us to come into conference and there to decide what shall be done. It certainly does not prevent us nor exclude our representatives from deciding upon force. If they think it is wise to use force, it is certainly within their power to decide upon that, and if they do decide upon that we are morally bound to carry it out just the same as we were under article 10 of the League of Nations covenant.

Mr. POINDEXTER. One of the most conspicuous features of this instrument is the fact that our representatives gain from this document no authority, no governmental power, except what exists under the Constitution of the United States. There is not a word in the instrument which would confer upon the President or upon any other representative of the United States authority to commit any act except in a constitutional method, when authorized by the Congress of the United States, or by such other sanction as required by our fundamental law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I contend that no treaty can take away a constitutional right of Congress. It can bind us morally to do a certain thing. It can bind the entire Government to do it. Of course, if the Congress sees fit to repudiate it it can repudiate it, as it can any treaty, but the moral obligation is there so long as the treaty is in existence. A nation can not disregard a solemn obligation of a treaty upon the plea that some particular department of the Government fails to act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. REED. The argument made by the Senator from Washington is exactly the same argument that was made repeatedly upon the floor of the Senate with reference to article 10 of the League of Nations covenant, which he was one of the foremost Senators in denouncing.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is a very great difference between them.

Mr. REED. It was then contended by the proponents of that instrument that it did not violate the Constitution of the United States, because it was said that no treaty could take away from Congress its constitutional prerogative to declare war or withhold a declaration of war, but that it created an obligation which would be binding upon us in our honor.

This instrument binds us to come into common council to advise the most efficient means of resisting force. If we should enter into this agreement, if the exigency arose, and the nations assembled, and our representative and the representatives of other Governments agreed upon a course of military action, and the Congress refused to ratify it, we would stand before the world as breakers of treaties. If we are free to take that course, then every other nation is equally free to take the same course, and you have an obligation to meet, to consider, and to determine, with it being understood in advance that nobody is bound; and yet if you were to take this instrument and to write into it a clause that it should not be binding, either morally or legally, upon any of the parties to it, it would become the laughingstock of the world.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will answer in just a word what the Senator from Missouri has said. I agree with the Senator from Missouri as to the obligation to comply with an agreement we have entered into. If article 10 of the League of Nations covenant had been ratified, we would have agreed affirmatively to preserve the political independence and the territorial integrity of every member of the league. I never made the argument, but I heard it made, that it would have been necessary for Congress to take action to carry out that agreement. That was no alleviation of its demerits, in my opinion; because, in my opinion, Congress was at least morally obliged to take such action to carry it out. But the simple answer to the comparison which the Senator from Missouri makes between article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations and this instrument is that this instrument contains no such language. There is not anything in it which could be distorted into either a legal or a moral obligation on the United States to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of any one of these parties.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to say a word?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. In my opinion the Senator from Idaho is exactly correct when he says there is no legal difference between the nature of the obligation carried in article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations and that included in articles 1 and 2 of the four-power treaty. Article 1 obligates the high contracting powers "as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean." That is comparable to the first sentence of article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations, under which the members of the league undertook to respect, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

Article 2 of the four-power treaty, as quoted, obligates the parties to the covenant, if the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, to arrive at an understanding as to the most effectual means to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation, whereas in article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations the provision is:

> In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council will advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled.

As suggested to me by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the language of article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations is not as strong as that contained in article 2 of the four-power treaty, coupled with the first clause of article 1 of the four-power treaty. In both cases the legal nature of the obligation is the same. It arises upon aggression or threat of aggression, and in case of threat of aggression, or any act of aggression, by any other than the high contracting parties, all four of the high contracting parties are to get together and decide whether they shall proceed jointly or severally, and upon the best means to carry out the obligation. "To meet the exigencies of the particular situation," while very indefinite language, can not mean anything else than to determine upon the method by which the obligation shall be fulfilled.

Mr. REED. And if the exigency is war, how will they meet it?

Mr. ROBINSON. They will meet it by force, of course.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Am I to understand the Senator from Arkansas to contend—and I am asking this in order to develop his view—that in effect the four-party agreement just published requires the United States to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the other parties to that agreement?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the Senator, of course, understands, if he has read the four-power treaty, that its operation is limited to insular rights and insular possessions. It does obligate the United States to confer with the other three powers signing the treaty as to the best means by which those rights and possessions shall be preserved in case they are assailed by any other than one of the contracting parties, and to further show that this is the correct construction of it——

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is what it says.

Mr. ROBINSON. Take the last clause of article 1. If these four powers, or any of them, differ as to the nature of their rights in the insular possessions, they get together and try to find a way of settling it. If any other nation, by an act of aggression, assails them, they get together and decide upon the best means to preserve those rights and possessions. "To meet the exigencies of the particular situation" can not mean anything else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator argue that as to the island possessions and dominions the language of the agreement which he just read is equivalent to a guaranty to preserve their territorial integrity?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not an express guaranty of territorial integrity, but it is a guaranty that this Nation will confer with the other three nations as to the best means of accomplishing that end, and as stated by the Senator from Idaho, it does involve a moral obligation, forceful and binding.

Mr. KELLOGG. What is the objection to consulting about it, as long as there is not a guaranty that we will preserve the territorial integrity?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Arkansas has not suggested an objection. The Senator from Arkansas is arguing that that is the correct construction of the obligation, and that it is not distinguishable from the obligation under article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations, except that this obligation deals with a comparatively unimportant subject and is limited to an undertaking on the part of four powers, whereas the covenant of the League of Nations, including article 10, related to all the powers entering the league.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Minnesota what the objection to it is. My objection to the proposition is this: By this the powers agree that—

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

It can not be denied that we have there delegated to this conference to pass judgment upon the most efficient measures of meeting the exigency of the situation. If they do pass upon it and determine that force is the most efficient measure by which to meet it, we are bound by that, are we not?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think we are bound to take any particular action.

Mr. BORAH. If we are not bound by it, of course it is not a dangerous treaty. What is the treaty for if we are not bound by it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho contend that if in a conference over some aggression upon the island possessions of one of these parties, the majority—three of the parties—agree to set up a court, the other party is bound to join with them in it?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President; I am not contending for that at all, although that is very likely what would happen.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That might happen, but it would not be imposed by this agreement. It could stay in or stay out, as it saw fit.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is arguing something which the Senator from Idaho is not suggesting.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thought the Senator had suggested that in his answer to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not suggest that. I suggested that if the conference, including our representatives, decide upon a certain course, then the Congress of the United States and the Executive are bound to carry it out, in morals.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not agree with the Senator at all. I think that in this conference our representatives would have no more power than they have at the present time. There is not any new power created by this agreement. There are no new agencies erected by it, and, in my opinion, there is very little new obligation created by it. The only effect of it is to put in written form and to express the concurrence on the part of these parties to a course of conduct which humanity and decency would require a nation to follow in any event, even though there were no such agreement.

Mr. REED. In other words, the best thing the Senator can say for it is that it does not do anything.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not say that; that is the Senator's statement. I think it does a great deal.

Mr. REED. What does it do? The Senator just said it did not do anything.

Mr. WARREN. Will not my colleagues allow the Senator from Idaho to finish his speech, so that we may go on with the business before the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course we are meeting precisely the same question and the same argument we met in the discussion of the League of Nations; that is, that one day it meant a great deal and the next day it did not mean anything.

I urged two fundamental objections to the league, one that it would entangle us with foreign nations. But let us put that aside entirely and assume that we are all willing to surrender that doctrine, and that we are willing to go into an alliance or a league, and let us consider it simply from the other standpoint, which was the basis of my objection, that it was not a league of peace but that it was a league for war.

I am not one of those who believe that policies determine armaments. I think the reverse is true, and it does not make any difference what the verdict of your league or your alliance may be, if the nations are armed cap-a-pie, that which you have organized for the purpose of preserving peace will become an alliance or a league for war.

For this I contend that if we go out of this conference with these four nations holding the control of the naval power of the world, and representing all the armed force of the world, when they meet there under article 2 they will meet as a military force to carry this instrument into effect by military means and not by peaceful means.

I want to illustrate that again. I call attention to the fact that the League of Nations, so far as the language was concerned, was dedicated entirely to the question of effectuating peace through peaceful means. So far as the language of the covenant was concerned, the desire was to attain one object, and that is the same thing we have here, to adjust difficulties through peaceful means. But the only time the Geneva conference was swept off its feet, the first time it met, was when some delegate proposed to create a large international navy and a large international army; and the second time they met precisely the same exhibition took place. This brought forth a statement by one of the members of the conference, who said upon the floor of the assembly:

> The members here are not nominated by the league, nor controlled by the league. They are nominated by virtue of the war ministries and the admiralties of the different countries, and they receive their instructions from their ministries at home. That is to say, for the league itself, in dealing with these questions, there is an outpost of war ministers with regard to these questions, from the point of view of military attachés, and not as servants of the league nor advocates of peace.

This illustrates one objection to this proposition, as the matter will stand when this conference closes. It will be a military alliance, because there will be no disarmament which will be calculated to bring about the settlement of these matters through peaceful means instead of through military means.

If we are willing to put aside the question of nonentangling alliances, and to discard the teachings of Washington, then, so far as I am concerned, if that is to be the ultimate result, I am perfectly willing to join an alliance by which nations will counsel. I am perfectly willing to join a league of nations by which they will counsel, provided they disarm, so that when they meet they will not meet as armed forces but as peaceful nations. I want the situation such that I can feel reasonably sure that the nations when they meet will think of arbitration, of justice of courts and not of force.

So long as it is an armed world and armed to the full, the league which we write and the alliance which we write will be an armed league, an armed alliance, and settle their matters in that way. When we meet here in the midst of the Pacific to settle these questions, as I said a moment ago, unless they do something at this disarmament conference there will not be any subtraction whatever from the fighting power of those nations as it existed when we went into the war in 1914. We will be just as thoroughly equipped for war as we were when we entered the great World War. We will be better equipped because we will have the efficiency and the perfection of the submarine and the poison gas and every other instrument of torture and desolation which the satanic ingenuity of man could invent during that struggle.

Therefore, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I wish to be understood as opposing the proposition until there is some evidence of real disarmament.

I shall not give my consent to the United States becoming a member of a military alliance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator speaks in favor of disarmament. Am I to understand the Senator from Idaho to mean that literally—that he favors a complete disarmament for these several nations?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Mr. President, I understand that we could not have at this time complete disarmament.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator favor it?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I would favor it if I could get it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator, then, would have the nations, including the United States, with no armament at all, and, as I understand it, would be disposed to rely upon such an agreement as this.

Mr. BORAH. If I had my way about it, I would disarm down to the question of a police force in and for the respective nations of the world.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And depend upon this agreement, which the Senator now says is dangerous?

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not depend upon this agreement. It is a lame and impotent affair so far as providing peaceful methods of settling disputes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Or some other agreement.

Mr. BORAH. I would depend upon the power of public opinion to enforce the rights of the respective nations without arms, and I would set up institutions and courts to that end.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much afraid the Senator would be disillusioned on the question of public opinion.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator is not in favor of disarmament, why juggle the proposition and disarm a little? It does not do any good to disarm a little. We are just as well equipped for war, and will be when we get through with this disarmament program as we were before. We have sunk 15 battleships, which the Senator from Washington would not have sent into naval combat if he had been an admiral, but the question of the submarine, poison gas, airplanes, and all the instrumentalities with which the Senator would fight the war have not been touched at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is difficult for me to realize what I would do if I could imagine myself being an admiral, but that raises the question which the Senator brought into the discussion in the Senate some time ago about the relative value of capital ships in naval warfare. All I have to say about that is that all the other naval authorities in the world, if I may use that expression, so far as official authority is concerned, regard capital ships as the basis of naval power. The Senator from Idaho may be right and they all may be wrong, but that is the basis upon which this conference among the nations is being conducted, in an effort to bring about a limitation of naval armament.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator said the battleship is the basis of the navy, the backbone of the navy. I read a few moments ago, when the Senator was not here, I take it, that the battleship is no longer the backbone of the navy. That is said by Admiral Sims. The battleship has no defense against airplanes and no offensive against airplane carriers, which are speedy enough to get away. We need not go into that question again, but I do not think the Senator ought to say that such is the opinion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said the official authorities.

Mr. BORAH. Admiral Sims is the head of the Naval Board, is he not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Admiral Sims is not the head of the Naval Board and is not authorized to fix the naval policy of the United States. There is authority to fix that policy, and that authority, in so far as these international negotiations are concerned, acting through the President of the United States, has decided that the basis of the naval strength is the capital ship, and the units of capital ships are the measure by which the powers propose to be guided in the limitation of their respective fleets.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With the permission of the Senator from Idaho I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if the official statement given out is not to the effect that, if this four-power agreement is sanctioned, the Anglo-Japanese treaty or alliance will be automatically ended? When the Senator from Washington said that the present four-party agreement, section 2, amounts to nothing, does he not place himself in the attitude of saying that the odious—odious to the western world—alliance between Great Britain and Japan amounts to nothing?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Georgia bases that question upon an erroneous premise. I did not say that this agreement amounted to nothing. I said that it created no new agencies and it imposed no new obligations upon the United States, but it does this, and I think that it is very far from amounting to nothing. It expresses a policy of action to be applied to emergencies as they arise from time to time, but that policy is to be carried out by existing agencies of government, not by any supergovernment or a council of foreign nations; but, in so far as the United States is concerned, by the United States itself and its constitutional authority.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Let me say a word, and then I shall sit down.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would like to ask the Senator from Washington a question right at that point.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator from Washington believe that Japan would voluntarily surrender what she is now getting under the Anglo-Japanese alliance unless Japan thought she was getting something equally as good, if not better?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, no one here need be uneasy about what Japan is getting, because Japan will take care of herself. That is demonstrated to a certainty, both at Versailles and in this conference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What she will get and what the relative status of the various nations concerned will be is not determined by this agreement that we are discussing here. That is very limited in its operation. I might agree with the Senator from Georgia in a great many observations upon the interests of Japan and the United States, respectively, in Asia. How much Japan would get out of this conference no man can tell until the conference is ended. What we are discussing at the present time is the particular matter of the four-party agreement which has been signed, and which does not deal with the matter of other questions between the nations.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. How does the Senator from Washington understand that this recognition of the equality of Japan and our taking her into this kind of an alliance would affect the 11 States on the Pacific slope which are interested in the Japanese question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. To be perfectly frank, the 11 States on the Pacific coast, if they had their way, as I view it, would rely upon the naval strength of the United States to protect them. To say the least, they are not injured in any way by the agreement, but in my opinion they are benefited by it in the manner which I pointed out a moment ago, in that the agreement of the other parties to this four-party arrangement, including France and Great Britain, is to use their influence to prevent an aggression upon the island possessions or the island dominions, which includes those, of course, of the United States, in the Pacific, and consequently tends to remove or to minimize the probabilities of an attack upon them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I hope——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, just a moment.

Mr. BORAH. I do not wish to be interrupted further. I will yield the floor in a moment.

Mr. STANLEY. Before the Senator takes his seat, though I do not wish to interrupt him, I would like to ask him a simple question.

Mr. BORAH. Ask me a question?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator, to begin at the bottom of my question and work to the top, read here something with reference to the four-party treaty to the effect that it is made for the purpose of preserving peace. Is the Senator acquainted with any great alliance ever made between these powers, except the United States—the quadruple alliance, the triple alliance, the holy alliance, or any other alliance seeking the balance of power in Europe—that it was not on the face of it for the purpose of preserving peace and expressly decried any idea of war?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly; that is always true. That goes back to the proposition which I have stated once or twice, that I think these alliances and leagues are always interpreted or construed according to the military capacity or power of the signers of the alliance or league. It is for that reason that I rose to-day to urge that if we are going to be asked to go into this alliance, then there must be such disarmament here as would indicate that it is not made as a military alliance, but, as a matter of fact, for the purpose of effecting a settlement through peaceful means. If we meet and assemble under this alliance under such conditions as will exist at the time this conference closes, with reference to disarmament, it will be a military alliance, it will be a naval alliance, and nothing else.

Mr. STANLEY. In the language of Napoleon, these four powers mean to have peace under this treaty if they have to fight for it.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly; and the Senator from Washington has just revealed the fact that the conference will adjourn upon the theory that all matters must be settled by force. He rather scouts the idea that we should disarm to the extent of relying upon anything but force. If we should not disarm to the extent that we could rely upon the justice or righteousness or the influence and the power of public opinion to enforce arbitration and settlement, then there is no reason to call this conference at all. If we are going to rely upon force, and that is to be the fundamental principle upon which we are proceeding in the future, then there is no reason why we should call the conference for disarmament.

My idea of disarmament is that we should reduce the arms to such extent that it manifests an intention upon the part of the nations of the world to settle their troubles through peaceful means and not through armed force, and unless we do that I do not propose to join any combination to control the Pacific which combination may be turned into a military and naval autocracy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read the letter which I send to the desk and that the articles attached to it be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The letter was read by the reading clerk.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the letter be printed in the ordinary RECORD type, but that request does not apply to the articles which, however, I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter read by the reading clerk and the articles referred to are as follows:

MILLER FREEMAN PUBLICATIONS,
71 COLUMBIA STREET,
Seattle, Wash., November 30, 1921.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to submit attached statement of Canon W. H. Bliss made at the "antidope" meeting called by the governor and held in Seattle November 26, in which he charged that the Japanese are flooding this country with dope in the same manner and for the same sinister purposes as they are conducting this traffic in China.

These grave charges made by the head of the White Cross Society are worthy of your most serious consideration as United States Senator from this State.

The Federal administration has repeatedly admonished the citizens of the Pacific coast that they or the States should not attempt to deal with the various phases of the Japanese problem, but leave their solution to the Federal Government.

Yet not only has the Federal Government taken no action of decisive character, but it is actually a party to Japanese aggressions which constitute a formidable assault on our people and on our country.

Specific instances are:

1. Leasing of lands on the Yakima Indian Reservation to Japanese.

2. Monopoly of the fishing industry of southern California by the Japanese who are allowed to operate out of our ports in violation of the Federal coastwise navigation laws.

3. Wholesale trafficking in opiates by the Japanese.

4. Attempted corruption and intimidation, through powerful financial interests, commercial and religious organizations, of members of the Legislature of the State of Washington by Japanese in attempt to prevent passage of land bill which applied to all aliens.

5. Operation of Japanese propaganda bureau under the direction of K. K. Kawakami, San Francisco.

6. Operation of Japanese propaganda journals and subsidizing of American publications by Japanese interests.

7. Operation of Japanese language schools.

8. Allowing Japanese to operate producing and marketing combinations, with power to dictate prices to be paid white producers, and prices to be paid by white consumers.

9. Since President Roosevelt concluded the so-called "Gentlemen's agreement" by which Japan on her honor agreed to keep her people out of this country, she has sent here on her passports more than 100,000 nationals, under the guise of merchants, students, wives, etc., who have become permanent residents. Read Roosevelt's biography and you will be convinced that Japan has grossly violated the terms of her agreement.

All of these are matters which the Federal Government alone can deal with.

For a good many years the people of the Pacific coast have been exceedingly patient, having been led to believe by representations of the Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, and Harding administrations that they should leave the settlement of the Japanese question to the Federal Government, yet immigration of this obnoxious and unassimilable race still continue.

The people of this coast are determined to keep this a white man's country if they have to fight for it. Unless the issue is met with courage immediately and definitely settled it will certainly bring on war with Japan.

Yours, very truly,

MILLER FREEMAN.

[From the Seattle Star, Thursday, Dec. 1, 1921.]

JAPAN PERIL UP TO SENATE—SAYS FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IS AIDING NIPPON—MILLER FREEMAN MAKES SENSATIONAL CHARGES IN LETTER CALLING ATTENTION TO DOPE.

That the Federal Government is a party, "either directly or by acquiescence," to Japanese aggressions which "constitute a formidable assault on our people and on our country," is the charge made by Commander Miller Freeman in a letter he dispatched to-day to Senator MILES POINDEXTER.

The letter was written to call attention to the charges made at the recent dope conference by Canon W. H. Bliss that Japan is deliberately promoting the narcotic traffic in this country in an effort to make America's young men unfit for military service.

Commander Freeman takes advantage of the opportunity to specify other objectionable activities of the Japanese on the west coast, either tolerated or actually assisted by the Federal Government.

"Unless this issue is met with courage immediately and definitely settled," the letter concludes, "it will certainly bring on war with Japan."

[From the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, Sunday, Nov. 27, 1921.]

HEAD OF WHITE CROSS DECLARES DOPE EVIL THREATENS HUMANITY.

Canon W. H. Bliss, of Seattle, pastor of Trinity Episcopal Church and head of the White Cross Society for the prevention of the narcotic curse in this State, made one of the most stirring addresses of the governor's conference. He was repeatedly interrupted with applause.

He was introduced by Chairman Thomas P. Revelle as the man who had most unselfishly and tirelessly worked, in season and out, just out of love for humanity and desire to defeat the forces of evil that would wreck humanity.

Rev. Mr. Bliss said:

"After all this is not a matter for the law-enforcement officers exclusively, but it is for the general public to put full force into the campaign.

"If the public conscience could only be thoroughly aroused the matter of law enforcement would not be the difficult task that it is now. The thing we have most to combat and the thing this conference should now set itself most specifically and particularly to combat is the blindness, seemingly willful blindness, of the general public to the terrible menace to society of the drug habit.

"May I offer these figures for your consideration? They represent the importation into the United States of crude opium for the three years of 1917, 1918, and 1919, and show the startling growth of the demand upon the American drug-manufacturing plants in this country for the finished "dope," the derivatives of the raw opium, which include morphine as well as the manufactured opium for smoking purposes that dope users call 'mud':

	Pounds.

EACH NEW CUSTOMER BRINGS SIX.

"Between the years of 1917 and 1918 the demand for the stuff increased nearly 200 per cent, between 1918 and 1919 nearly 330 per cent, and between 1917 and 1919 more than 1,000 per cent. That bears out the well-known adage of dope peddlers: 'When you make one new customer he makes six more for you.'

"Think also of this startling fact: One ton of morphine is equal to 500,000,000 so-called 'shots.' How many billion 'shots' are being manufactured in the United States every year?

"The United States imports from thirteen to seventy-two times as much crude opium as any other nation in the world. The doctors and dentists don't use it all. They use very little of it. The great bulk of it is exported, later to be smuggled back into this country.

"How many addicts in the United States? Take the figures of trained experts, who have given the study of a lifetime to the narcotic evil. The estimates vary between 1,000,000 and 4,000,000 addicts. Dr. Reidy says 1,988,000. Say we have 2,000,000 addicts. That is 1 person out of every 50, and it would bear out the estimates of the Seattle police and Dr. Read, city health officer, which place the total in Seattle between 8,000 and 10,000.

"Consider also that fully 25 per cent of the addicts are always unemployed—hopeless hoboes and vagrants. Consider the effect of the narcotic evil on your unemployment problem."

ADDICTS SPEND MILLION DAILY.

At this stage Mr. Bliss called upon expert witnesses in the audience to tell the people how much daily the average dope fiend required to get his drug. R. F. Baerman, one of Inspector Hans Damm's chief assistants in the city antinarcotic service, said from $5 to $9 a day. Miss Cora West, superintendent of the Lakeside Hospital, said from $4 to $8 a day.

"Suppose we say that the minimum expenditure of a dope addict is $3 a day. Two million addicts in the United States at $3 a day—that is $6,000,000 a day, or $2,190,000,000 a year, and $2,000,000,000 a year would pay all the costs of running the United States Government that are not directly attributable to war.

"In Seattle users of the dope will spend from $15,000 to $30,000 a day. That is from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 a year, and would pay all the expenses of running our city government. Think of such a sum going into the pockets of these ghoulish devils who prey upon the souls and bodies of our citizens.

"I think Hans Damm said the truest thing I have ever heard about the horror and the bottomless pit of the illicit drug-peddling business when he declared that a dope peddler was worse than a murderer in just so far as the fate to which he consigned his victims was worse than death.

"This will give you some idea of why the dope business is so lucrative and why it is so hard to stop.

"Hard to stop? How can 200 men, which is all the United States Government has assigned to stopping it, guard 10,000 miles of coast line? How can 200 men put to route an army of 15,000 to 20,000 vicious, furtive, lawless dope peddlers?

EVERY VESSEL BRINGS IN DOPE.

"There is not one vessel coming into the port of Seattle that does not bring in with it, hidden somewhere, dope.

"One vessel last year brought in $120,000 worth. I heard a man, whose word I am willing to believe, say he saw 65,000 pounds in one container near Seattle. Sixty-five thousand pounds of morphine is enough to kill every man, woman, and child in the city of Seattle.

"'In 10 years,' said a great Japanese physician, who studied the narcotic business in this country for some years, '5,000,000 young Americans will be unfit for military duty because of the hold the drug has upon them.'

"Can we not see the great national menace behind this? Many hundreds of thousands of pounds of morphine are shipped to Japan. It doesn't stop in Japan. Japan has the strictest laws of any nation on earth against the use of narcotic drugs by its citizens. Japan ships this stuff to her controlled ports of China, where it is given away to beginners in the use of dope. The Japanese tell the unhappy Chinese victims that it is white man's medicine. They get him inoculated with the habit till he can't get along without it, and then tell him that the stuff is so scarce that they haven't any more to give away, but will have to make him pay for it now. Then they have him where they want him.

"And huge quantities of that which is shipped to Japan is smuggled back to the United States."

Canon Bliss went at some length to describe so-called "snow parties" among boys and girls of Seattle of high-school age. A voice in the audience asked him what he meant by "snow parties."

"'Snow' is cocaine. It is white and glistens like snow. There are parties of automobilists organized among boys and girls of high-school age. They sniff cocaine and that adds life to their party. Our jazz music and snow parties are simply on different ends of the same string. Our young people are crazed for new excitement.

"Diseased bodies and drug addiction are going hand in hand with boys and girls of 15 and 16.

"Not any menace to-day faces our people that is equal to the drug menace.

"We need laws with teeth. It is a common thing to see a drug peddler walk out of a United States court with a sneer on his face because of the inadequate sentence passed on him.

"Notorious Chinese and Japanese peddlers are arrested over and over again, and get off with sentences that are not punishment but merely license. Our Federal deportation laws ought to be made more adequately to fit their cases."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is it not a little singular that the advocacy of an alliance or an agreement with Japan should be followed by a letter accusing Japan of a direct violation of the arrangement which she already has with this country?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may not the reading of the bill now be proceeded with?

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I send to the desk a notice in writing of a motion which I intend to make to suspend the rules. I will ask that the notice be read and that the amendment which I propose to offer to the pending bill be read at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona gives notice of a motion to suspend the rules. The Secretary will read the notice.

The reading clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 12, 1921.

I hereby give notice that under and by virtue of the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I shall move to suspend paragraphs 2 and 3 of Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, for the purpose of offering to the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, the following amendment:

Mr. ASHURST. If it be a sufficient compliance with the rule, I will not ask that the amendment be read, but merely that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. Let the proposed amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule requires the reading of the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming before having the amendment read.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arizona well knows that I am desirous of providing adequately for the disabled soldiers, and we propose, in a proper way, to do so. We are now and have been all day long listening to debate on matters which are not concerned with the pending bill. I still expect to have the bill passed and sent to conference to-night. To delay its passage so that the proposed amendment which to become in order has to lie over for a day would place the bill in such attitude that we would be in default on the 15th instant and be unable to provide properly for the soldiers who are already in the hospitals. Now, I ask the Senator if he is not willing to withdraw his proposition, since we are all aiming at the same object?

Mr. ASHURST. If I may have a vote on my amendment to-night, I shall be very glad to withdraw it for the present. If there shall be a guaranty that no point of order will be made against the amendment, I shall be delighted now to withdraw it. If the Senator can give me that guaranty, I will withdraw the amendment at this moment.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know what the Senator from Arizona wishes to submit, and there is no guaranty that I could make, of course, as to what might occur.

Mr. ASHURST. If the reading of the amendment may not now be dispensed with under the rule, I shall have to ask that it be read, and I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Arizona will be read.

The READING CLERK. On page 25 it is proposed to strike out lines 23, 24, 25, and 26, and on page 26 strike out all of lines 1 to 14, inclusive, and to insert the following:

That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, such hospitals and out-patient dispensary facilities, to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, approach work, roads, and trackage facilities leading thereto, vehicles, live stock, furniture, equipment, and accessories, and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel, and the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named therein. Such hospital plants shall be of fireproof construction, and the location and nature thereof, whether for the treatment of tuberculous, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

That for carrying into effect the preceding paragraph relating to additional hospital facilities there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000 to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the time has arrived in the progress of hospitalizing the ex-service men when no further explanations or excuses may be offered. The situation is one which calls for immediate action. There is in this pending bill a provision to appropriate $1,000,000 to enable the Government of the United States to take part in the International Exposition at Rio de Janeiro. Naturally the opulent Government of the United States, which courts and deserves the esteem of other powers and other peoples, can not be oblivious to the fact that we should in due time take our proper part in the International Exposition at Rio de Janeiro, which will require the expenditure of $1,000,000; but are we prepared to vote $1,000,000 to take part in the International Exposition at Brazil when in one town in the United States 950 tubercular soldiers are suffering from neglect? Are Senators ready on their conscience to say that they prefer that this $1,000,000 shall be spent for an international exposition rather than for the hospitalization of tubercular soldiers?

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just concluded a brilliant speech in which he depicted the horrors of war. I wonder if he knows and do other Senators know that in one city in this country 950 suffering soldier boys are shamefully neglected by a most opulent Government? On Armistice Day we had services in honor of the unknown dead; and the private soldier was permitted to stand on the sidewalk and see the procession go by. Fifty thousand dollars were appropriated by Congress for the purpose of making arrangements for the exercises, and this sum was spent in giving admirals and generals and high foreign dignitaries seats; but the "gold star" mother received scant attention; no gold-star mother was brought here to participate in those exercises. All the soft seats and all the carriages and the equipages were preempted by generals and admirals and high foreign dignitaries. Now, with 950 ex-service men suffering from neglect on the streets of Phoenix, Ariz., we are going to "shell out" $1,000,000 to participate in an exposition in Brazil, but refuse to hospitalize those who stood in the iron storm of war and breathed poison gases in order that our civilization might be saved.

What are the facts? Am I within the bounds of truth when I say that 950 ex-service men require hospitalization in one town in this country? I see the learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] before me. He is a member of the Senate committee on investigation which was appointed by virtue of Senate resolution 59, presented by the same Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. That committee is presided over by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. Three times in public I have urged that committee to go to Arizona. I now challenge them to go.

Are the luxuries of Washington so soft that they will not leave the District of Columbia? Do they think of nothing except of Washington and its beautiful environments? I know the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is ready and willing to go there, as he has so expressed himself. Let that committee of upstanding Senators accept my challenge and go to the Salt River Valley, where 950 men are suffering because of neglect. Let the committee abandon for a few days the soft luxuries of Washington and go into the country and see what is going on with respect to the soldiers. Will my challenge be accepted? I think it will be, because I will build a pretty hot fire under the committee if they do not go to Arizona and investigate conditions.

On the 2d day of last November——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. I know the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] would go in a moment if the chairman would authorize him. I demand that the chairman of the committee either go there or resign and let some one take his place who will investigate the conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Could the committee, if they should visit Phoenix, Ariz., do more than the Senator is now doing, namely, make a vigorous protest against the dilatory tactics of the administrative officers in not building with reasonable speed hospital facilities with the money which they now have?

Mr. ASHURST. I think if the Senator went there and saw and conversed with the men who went through the iron storm of the war and talk to them I believe his heart would be touched and so would that of the entire committee, and they would become advocates of proper relief for our ex-service men. So much for generalities. What are the facts? On the 2d day of November, when the tax bill was before the Senate, I submitted an amendment similar to the one I have just presented. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, asked me to withhold the amendment, because it could not go on that bill. I did so. My friend from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] said that the Committee on Appropriations, of which he is chairman, would give this matter attention, and would provide an adequate appropriation. Now, I wish my friend Senator WARREN——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment. I wish my learned friend to understand that I am not criticizing him. He has acted according to the light before him, but I believe if he knew the situation as I do he would be the first, because he himself is an ex-soldier, to declare himself for proper hospitalization. It will not do to tell me that in this bill there is already adequate provision, because there is not.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, before the Senator gets too far from this proposition.

Mr. ASHURST. I will not yield to the Senator under that suggestion. The Senator will wait until I get through. I am not getting away from the proposition; I am just coming to it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator stated that I said something, but he did not state accurately what I said, and I wished to make a correction before he got too far from it.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I will yield.

Mr. WARREN. I said that the matter would be considered by the committee, and it has been considered. I have done exactly as the Senator asked me to do. Witnesses have been brought before the committee and have been examined. The matter will be reached in another way, and the proper relief will soon be provided, or otherwise provision would probably have been made on this bill. We are, however, lacking two of the elements to enable us to make the provision the Senator desires on this particular measure at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, we will get back to that question later. I want to talk about facts. At that time I read a telegram from the governor of Arizona. The governor of Arizona pointed out that ex-soldiers, not by the dozens, not by the score, but by the hundreds, were pouring into the Southwest, because they believed—whether erroneously or not we do not know, but they believed—that the salubrious climate of the Southwest was a healing balm for the specific malady from which they suffered, was a cure for soldiers afflicted with tuberculosis and soldiers who had been gassed; that the local authorities were absolutely powerless to cope with the situation; that the State authorities were unable to deal with it; and since that time the number has doubled. Only Saturday, only to-day, I conferred with the editor of the leading Republican daily paper in the State and with the governor. Thursday I conferred with Director Forbes, of the Veterans' Bureau. They each and all say that those soldiers there are without adequate hospital facilities; that they are going out upon the desert and dying from lack of hospitalization; and yet we propose to appropriate $1,000,000 so that some of the social climbers at Washington and elsewhere may journey to Brazil and there take part in an exposition. Well and good; meanwhile our soldiers die from neglect.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator explain what Director Forbes suggests as a remedy?

Mr. ASHURST. Director Forbes suggests as a remedy the appropriation of $16,000,000 immediately to be put into his hands, so that he may sever the damnable red tape that is costing the lives of so many soldiers, and that he may act instead of talking about it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I sympathize with that plan, and I commend the Senator for his interest and zeal in this important and pressing necessity. The Senator knows that the special committee to which the subject was referred made that recommendation also; but what I should like to know is, What is being done now by our administrative officers to relieve the present situation? As the Senator knows, I am in full sympathy with the desire to relieve it.

Mr. ASHURST. I can speak only for the Southwest.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is being done by Director Forbes or by any other administrative officer in Washington to remedy the conditions of which the Senator and the Arizona press complain?

Mr. ASHURST. I am only speaking for Arizona. I will tell you what is being done in Arizona.

Many, if not most, of the people of the United States, whether erroneously or not, believe that the balmy, salubrious climate of the Southwest is a specific for tuberculosis. It may or may not be. I am not an expert. By reason of that belief ex-soldiers swarm into Arizona. I repeat, they come by the hundreds. Those who have studied tuberculosis know that it is a peculiar disease; the patient believes that if he could be taken to a different climate he could recover. He goes to that different climate at his own expense. He goes far from home. He is seized with homesickness. He becomes abject and miserable; his temperature rises; he dies.

The citizens of the Southwest have taken the tuberculosis patients into their homes. The Southwest is dotted with little hospitals—flimsy affairs, it is true—one here and one there. There is one in Phoenix with 64 or 65 beds; another one that has 14; another one that has 20; another one that has probably 25, and so on; but there is no coordinated, prudent, adequate method of treating these soldiers.

I know that Senators would take my word, but I will not ask them to take my word. Before they vote on this amendment, let them talk with Director Forbes. Before they vote on this amendment let them telegraph Dr. Sweet, of the Public Health Service, in Phoenix. Let them interview the governor of Arizona. Let them write the leading metropolitan journals of the State, Democratic and Republican. Let them telegraph any official of the State, and he will tell you that I am conservative in the number—it is 1,500 instead of 950—but I put it at 950 because that is the most conservative estimate I can make.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So I understand that the situation amounts to this, does it not: These men, without any advice from any official or medical authority, are flocking to Phoenix. They find the Government hospitals filled——

Mr. ASHURST. They find the local hospitals and many of the homes filled.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the Government hospitals in Arizona. There are some in Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; No. 50 and No. 51.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They find these Government hospitals filled with inmates, and all that the Government is doing is to urge these men to go away to some other hospital?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has conceived the situation exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What the Senator desires is, first of all, some temporary relief, the establishment of some temporary structures or hospitals, and secondly, the appropriation for new hospitals of this $16,000,000; and with that program I am in hearty sympathy with the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I am indebted to the Senator from Massachusetts, because he has in a few words stated what it has taken me many words to say. It is true, Senators—the record shows it—that in hospitals throughout the United States, for example, there are 90 beds vacant in one hospital, in another one 200, in another one 400, we will say; and if you consult the records you will find that many, many beds in the tuberculosis hospitals of the country are vacant. The Government, whether wisely or unwisely, is attempting to withdraw the tubercular and gassed soldiers from the Southwest, and agrees and offers to hospitalize those soldiers in other hospitals; and it may be, for aught I know, that the soldier could receive better or equally good hospitalization elsewhere than he could in Arizona, but you can not make the soldier believe it. The soldier shares the general feeling—which I say for the fourth time may be erroneous or not; I do not know—that if he can reach a balmy climate, where there is perpetual sunshine, where it is warm, he can recover. He shares that feeling. You can not drive from his mind the idea or belief that he will recover in the Southwest. The Government futilely and uselessly offers him transportation elsewhere. The Government futilely and uselessly offers him hospitalization elsewhere.

He remains where he is, and he resents the offer of the Government officers and hospital authorities to take him elsewhere. Sick, miserable, profoundly believing, and everybody telling him that the Southwest is where he will get well, he remains there. Now, are you thinking more of the status of this Government in Rio de Janeiro, or are you thinking of the soldier? That is the question that this body must determine to-morrow.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator for information, and to enable me better, perhaps, to vote on the general policy: We have appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars, as the Senator knows, for hospitalization——

Mr. ASHURST. Just a minute; not hundreds of millions; $18,600,000.

Mr. KING. I will be accurate if the Senator will let me get through.

Mr. ASHURST. All right.

Mr. KING. I repeat, we have appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for hospitalization and for the care of the soldiers. I am told by men who are just as solicitous for the welfare of the soldiers as the Senator from Arizona——

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator need not say that. One Senator is not more solicitous than the other. That is gratuitous. The Senator should withdraw that.

Mr. KING. No; I shall not withdraw it.

Mr. ASHURST. All right. Let it stand, then. I will answer it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator is going to take offense, I shall not interrupt him.

Mr. ASHURST. I was not offended, but I was not born yesterday. There was a sly insinuation that I am a little bit too zealous for the soldier, and that in the Senator's opinion there are other men here who are just as zealous for the soldier as the Senator from Arizona. I did not come to town yesterday. Now, I have been—shall I say it?—no, I will not. I was about to say, shall I be tricked and deceived longer on this soldier question? I shall demand proper treatment for sick soldiers.

Some of my words seem harsh, but they are true, Mr. President. That is the sad part of it. I have made this as my protest. I have made it over and over and over again. Let my learned friend from Utah [Mr. KING] go to Arizona as a member of the committee. He is an excellent lawyer and is a man of humanitarian impulse, and there he will see soldiers with hollow chests coughing their lives away, dying because we would not appropriate the money for their hospitalization. Nobody here has denied what I have to say, because to deny it would be to impeach every respectable journal in Arizona. To deny it would be to impeach the governor. To deny it would be to impeach the statements of the chambers of commerce. To deny it would be to impeach Mr. Forbes. I went to Director Forbes a month ago. He said:

> Go to the President immediately and ask him to use his strong arm and help me to cut the red tape. Will you not do that and help the soldier? I am tied up by red tape. If you will go to the President, Senator, and urge him to give me the authority and the power, I will hospitalize every soldier in Arizona within 60 days.

Thirty of those days have gone by, and no move has been made.

On to-morrow I will present an amendment dealing with this matter and ask for a vote on it. I know that it takes a two-thirds vote, but Senators can say then on their consciences whether the $1,000,000 shall go for buildings in Brazil or for hospitals for soldiers. I am not showing, as my learned friend might wish to insinuate, an undue zeal.

There have not been hundreds of millions of dollars appropriated. Eighteen million six hundred thousand dollars were appropriated in the closing days of the Sixty-sixth Congress, after a contest on this floor which lasted for many days and which should not have lasted for an hour. That has all been spent, and wisely spent. I am not criticizing the Government or any agency of the Government for wasting a single dollar of that money. I am only asking that they do more. Is my request unreasonable?

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] says he called witnesses. How many soldiers from Arizona did he call? Not one—not one.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, did the Senator from Arizona ask me to summon any soldiers from Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. No, I did not. I will be frank.

Mr. WARREN. And I did not summon them from other hospitals because I thought the better way was to make our inquiries through the regular sources—the United States Veterans' Bureau, the Public Health Service, the Treasury Department, and other sources connected with the whole situation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. What did the Treasury say it would do about this matter?

Mr. ASHURST. The department says: "I will send them to other hospitals. I will have my way about it."

The Treasury says, "We are going to send them where I want them to go, not where the soldier wants to go." The soldier in time of war went where others said he should go; but I say that in time of peace he ought not to be held to such a strict rule and be required to go where others think he should go. The soldier is dying. Is it not harsh to say, "You are going to the hospital we name, or die"?

Senators go to the Southwest when afflicted with tuberculosis. Almost the first Senator I ever saw was in the Southwest seeking relief from tuberculosis. I have had the honor and the pleasure to become acquainted with many of the great Senators and other public men of the past when they came to the Southwest, believing—whether erroneously or not, I do not know—that the balmy air there would relieve them; and yet, when the soldier goes there he is to be told to "move on."

I do not want to delay this bill. If the Senator from Wyoming will let me have a vote on my amendment and will not interpose a point of order, and will prevent his colleagues from interposing a point of order, we can vote to-night, and I have done my duty; and if I have said harsh things, they have been necessary. If I wounded my friend from Utah, such wounds were necessary. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend." This is no time for soft talk, when men in the streets of my capital city are petitioning me and petitioning their Government for a place in which to die decently. Should we indulge in soft talk under such circumstances?

Mr. President, I have finished my remarks. I do not think there is an official anywhere who will say that what I have said is untrue. He may say, "We want to hospitalize them elsewhere." I am asking for a vote on my amendment, and, if it be in order, I ask for it now. I ask for unanimous consent that a vote be taken on it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate is proceeding with the committee amendments. The Secretary will read the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 1, the committee proposes to insert:

To pay Lillie S. Knox, widow of Hon. Philander C. Knox, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. At this point I ask to have inserted an amendment from the committee, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 5, insert:

For the purchase or exchange of an automobile for the Vice President, $4,000.

Mr. KING. May I inquire if one has not been purchased since the Vice President was inaugurated?

Mr. WARREN. No; there has been no such purchase.

Mr. KING. I am making no question of it. I just made the inquiry as to whether one had been purchased.

Mr. WARREN. No.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, after the amendment just agreed to, the committee report to insert:

For driving, maintenance, and operation of an automobile for the Vice President for fiscal year 1921, $93.35.

Mr. KING. It is my recollection that the former appropriation bill carried an item for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. It carried it, but there is a deficiency, in order to carry it to the 30th of June.

Mr. KING. The amount allowed was inadequate?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it fell short. The Senator will notice that this is for the fiscal year 1921, which ended on the 30th of June.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee is, on page 3, after line 3, insert:

ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMMISSION.

To enable the commission created by section 23 of the public buildings act approved March 4, 1913, to investigate and report to Congress a suitable design for a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from the city of Washington to a point at or near the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, together with such surveys and estimates of cost as they may deem advisable, to be expended under the direction of the commission and to remain available until expended, $25,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that there was a great deal said by some newspapers, and by members of the majority party, to the effect that the expenses of the Government under Republican administration had been greatly reduced. Of course, there should have been material reductions in the transition period from war to peace, and there was a great deal of congratulation that the appropriations for the fiscal year 1922 aggregated but $3,909,282,209.46.

I stated, when the appropriation bills for the fiscal year 1921 were under consideration, that there would undoubtedly be deficiency bills, and that the amount which I have just stated would be greatly increased by reason of deficiency bills. We have before us now a deficiency bill calling for $106,857,868.92. We all know that this will not be the only deficiency appropriation bill. We all know that there will be millions, possibly tens of millions of dollars, and if certain contemplated legislation shall be enacted, perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars, added to the figures which I have given.

I wanted to call attention to that fact so that the record may be straight and that the facts may appear, that the appropriations which were announced some time ago as being the maximum were not the maximum, but that they will be greatly increased by this and by other appropriation bills.

Some of the items contained in this bill seem upon their face to be entirely proper. There are others which I think call for some explanation. The chairman of the committee, with commendable patience, has listened to various speeches this afternoon and is very anxious to get the pending bill through. Otherwise I should ask that he make an explanation as to many of these items. I hope that before we conclude the consideration of the bill he will offer an explanation as to some of the items.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is it the intention to finish the bill to-night?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, I will ask the Secretary to read the letter which I send to the desk, which will show the reason why we should finish the bill to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, December 3, 1921.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WARREN: May I call your attention to a very grave situation which will arise in connection with the proper care of disabled soldiers unless the deficiency bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, at least as far as the United States Veterans' Bureau is concerned, is passed by December 15.

The balance to the credit of the appropriation for vocational rehabilitation on November 30, 1921, was $5,565,477.73. The amount due on December 15 for payment of maintenance pay to approximately 100,000 trainees is $7,502,450.10.

The foregoing means that on December 15, 100,000 disabled ex-service men and their dependents will be without means of support unless the appropriation is passed. It means that some of these disabled men will probably be forced to drop their training in order to earn some sort of livelihood. It means that educational institutions with whom we have contracts for instruction will not receive their money and it means that employees of the bureau and such indispensable bills as coal, etc., can not be satisfactorily treated.

Because of the obvious desperate situation which will arise when 100,000 disabled men start clamoring for money which the Government has obligated itself to pay, I beg to urge that you take all possible steps to secure action on the deficiency appropriation for the United States Veterans' Bureau prior to December 15.

Very truly, yours,

LEON FRASER,
Acting Director United States Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Mississippi knows that there is quite a good deal to do after a bill of this kind passes the Senate. It must then go to the House and there it must be decided whether the bill shall go to conference, and while the conference committee may agree in the shortest possible time, a conference report must still go back and be presented to each of the bodies, and then the bill must be enrolled, signed, sent to the President, and so forth. I feel that there is a very narrow chance whether it is possible to enact it in the time left.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no inclination to do anything which would retard the passage of the bill. I am glad to see that the committee proposes to do something for the ex-soldiers, be they disabled or not. I am glad there is a good reason why this measure should be expedited. But I rose to ask as to the amount which the bill carries, as proposed to be amended by the Senate committee. It is $106,000,000, I understand.

Mr. WARREN. It carried approximately $103,000,000 as it came from the House, and about $3,000,000 has been added to it by the Senate committee.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask what was the estimate of the Budget Bureau for the deficiency bill? Was it less than this amount or more?

Mr. WARREN. It was more than this in some instances and very largely more in the matter we are discussing, the provision for the soldiers; but the information which came from the House was satisfactory to the committee that it was sufficient to carry it possibly to March. We shall have another deficiency bill very soon, containing other items which may come in. This bill, the Senator will remember, was left over from the last session.

Mr. HARRISON. The estimate of Gen. Dawes the other day in his initial report showed quite a saving from last year, and that was heralded throughout the country as a gigantic saving of some $450,000,000. Do I understand the Senator to say that the estimate of Gen. Dawes for this deficiency was more than is carried in the bill?

Mr. WARREN. It was in some particulars.

Mr. HARRISON. Can we have the figures in the aggregate?

Mr. WARREN. It originally carried $187,000,000 altogether. There is a difference of forty or fifty or sixty million dollars in this one item for the soldiers, which came as a result not of the action of the budget, but the action of the House in reducing the figures from those estimated by the budget.

Mr. HARRISON. So the item estimated by the Budget Commission was some $50,000,000 more for the soldiers than is contained in the bill as now presented?

Mr. WARREN. I will give the figures exactly in a moment. The Senator from Mississippi knows how indefinite that particular appropriation is, in that there are more soldiers in one place every day that must be taken care of, and less, perhaps, in another place at the same time, so that there never has been, and I do not know when there ever can be, an absolutely correct statement of what the expense may be three or six or nine months ahead. There are some other items of a similar character.

Mr. HARRISON. I am trying to get at the difference between the amount fixed by the action of the House and the estimate of the Budget Bureau. Gen. Dawes's estimate, as I understand the chairman, was forty or fifty million dollars more for disabled soldiers than is provided for in the bill, and notwithstanding that reduction the committee recommends an appropriation not within $80,000,000 of the amount Gen. Dawes says is needed. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. That does not follow the figures exactly, but is approximately right.

Mr. HARRISON. So if the Congress had appropriated all that Gen. Dawes recommended in his estimate, including the $50,000,000 additional for the soldiers, Congress would have appropriated $135,000,000 more, approximately?

Mr. WARREN. If we should appropriate all he estimated, it would be about $187,000,000 altogether.

Mr. HARRISON. But that does not include the forty or fifty million dollars, as I understood the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. HARRISON. It does?

Mr. WARREN. The House cut off $55,000,000 from that particular item.

Mr. HARRISON. So the pending bill carries then about $80,000,000 less than was estimated by Gen. Dawes?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; in that neighborhood.

Mr. HARRISON. If I recall the last deficiency bill that was passed by Congress, Gen. Dawes asked for $125,000,000 and we gave him $49,000,000. Am I right in those figures?

Mr. WARREN. I have not the figures here, but I think the Senator is not exactly correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to be corrected as to the figures.

Mr. WARREN. There are a great many figures that can not be carried in one's head all the time, the Senator will remember.

Mr. HARRISON. Anyway, in the last deficiency bill the estimate of Gen. Dawes was reduced approximately $75,000,000, and in this bill it is reduced approximately $80,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I understand very well what the Senator is after.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am just going to congratulate the committee upon the reduction.

Mr. WARREN. I will undertake to help him as much as I can. The first call that came from the different departments as to the probable deficiencies and additionals amounted to something like $375,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. More than the estimates?

Mr. WARREN. No; this was in advance of the budget estimates. Again passing the scrutiny of the department under the direction of the budget, those were reduced to $187,000,000. Because of the limitation of armaments conference that is in session in Washington, it was thought best by the department to ask that the naval item should be omitted, which is a matter of some $27,000,000, and that was omitted after the figures were made up, but on the request of the Budget Bureau. Then there was $55,000,000 of reduction made in one particular item by the House. There are certain other items that were estimated in the budget but left out by the House, some of which I propose to offer as committee amendments to the bill when we reach the proper point, that we wish to have retained. Has the Senator anything further?

Mr. HARRISON. There were two deficiency bills last year for which the Director of the Budget estimated, one carrying about $75,000,000 more than was appropriated and this one about $80,000,000 more than will be appropriated. What other deficiency bills were there in the last year?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wishes those to be introduced, I will send to my office and get them, but that is not a matter now before us.

Mr. HARRISON. No; but I know the Senator is the best informed Member here upon the finances of the Government, and I thought with his usual good memory he would have the figures at his finger tip. My recollection is there were four or five deficiency bills. The other day we had the report of the Budget Commission showing a very large decrease from the appropriations of last year, amounting to between $400,000,000 and $500,000,000. Of course the impression is created in the country that a great saving has been made by this single achievement, namely, the enactment of the budget system. If we are going to pass a lot of general appropriation bills and then have speeches made by Republican leaders stating that a great saving has been effected, and then have them bring in a lot of deficiency bills that carry the total amount appropriated up to the amount of the saving and more, then, of course, there is no saving, but there is an increase. So we are to start off here in the very first instance since the opening of the session with a deficiency bill carrying $108,000,000, reducing the estimate of the budget from $187,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator need not fear that there will be no other deficiency bill presented than this one. That is the way they do it. They say, "The appropriation of last year is reduced as contained in the general appropriation bill now before the Senate," and then in a month or two they come in with a deficiency bill and another deficiency bill and still another deficiency bill. It is mere camouflage for the people.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, and the people will never know what is going on. It is a matter of confusion and camouflage, as the Senator from North Carolina stated; but I was in hopes that appropriations would be made in the general appropriation bill and that we would not have saddled upon the people these large deficiency appropriation bills carrying, as in this instance, $108,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. So far as the Budget Bureau is concerned, that was organized only a few months ago, since March 4. There has been no general appropriation bill since and only one deficiency bill, as I remember. The fact is that there never has been a Congress in my short service here, as the Senator from Mississippi may view it, when we have not had a deficiency bill toward the end of every session. This came in near the close of the last session. It is not for the present session, but reached us too late for consideration at the last session. It reached us the day we adjourned.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. We made appropriations in various general appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922. Now we have not yet reached the calendar year 1922.

Mr. WARREN. But the Senator must remember these all run for the fiscal year.

Mr. KING. Of course, I understand that. We have only absorbed a part of the fiscal year 1922. Scarcely six months of the fiscal year 1922 have passed, and yet we are asked to appropriate by a deficiency bill more than $100,000,000. Usually deficiency appropriation bills come in after the expiration of the fiscal year, or at least toward the latter end of a fiscal year, but now, before the fiscal year is half over, we are called upon for deficiency appropriations, and I am admonished that there will be further deficiency appropriations, so that the appropriations for the fiscal year 1922, instead of being substantially $4,000,000,000, may be $4,500,000,000 or $5,000,000,000. Indeed, no one but a prophet—and the Senator from Wyoming is not a prophet—can tell us what the amount will be.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator can indulge in bogey men, as all of us can.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator tell us what it will be?

Mr. WARREN. Since the war we have had various deficiencies at various times, and now that the war is behind us we are trying to settle the hang-over items. It has taken time to present those and to demonstrate how those claims can be handled in order that they might be reduced from the enormous sum in which they were presented to the sum which is considered appropriate and justly due. We have had to deal with matters of that kind. We have always at the end of the year a lot of judgments of courts—the Court of Claims and others—which we have to take care of, as we have now.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, can the Senator from Wyoming tell me why it is that the House of Representatives should cut the appropriation down by $48,000,000 when the Senator admits that in the next deficiency bill we shall be called upon to restore it?

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from North Carolina can explain that as well as I. I think it is simply the proposition of the House to make two mouthfuls take the place of one. We should have made it one, if it had come to us in the first place.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then it appears that the appropriation was reduced by the other House that much below the estimate, with the idea that it would be provided for in another appropriation bill which is coming in March.

Mr. WARREN. That is the intention, I believe.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. One of the most urgent matters which we have before us at this time is that which relates to the question of unemployment in the country. Millions of men are out of work. May I ask is there a provision in the pending bill to take care of that very abnormal situation?

Mr. WARREN. In the first place, there is the regular provision of $225,000, to which the committee of the Senate has reported an amendment providing $100,000, which the Senator will find in the bill as we go along.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad that is in the bill. I have not had time to study the bill thoroughly.

Mr. WARREN. That is a committee amendment. Of course it will have to go to conference.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad the committee recognizes the necessity of taking some action in reference to the question of unemployment now existing in the country.

Mr. ASHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield it to the Senator, if I have the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, as I understand, the deficiency appropriation for vocational rehabilitation contained in the pending bill is due to the fact that the Committee on Appropriations failed to include in the annual appropriation bill $60,000,000 that the board having charge of vocational training desired and requested. The committee which has been investigating agencies dealing with the rehabilitation of the soldiers had their attention called to the fact that the appropriation for vocational training for the present fiscal year was less than a year ago, and that $60,000,000 would be required later in the way of a deficiency appropriation. I note that the committee has only recommended an appropriation of $40,000,000. Representatives of the Federal board alleged that they had failed to present their case to the Committee on Appropriations, or that the Committee on Appropriations had made a mistake in underestimating their requirements. The bare fact is that the regular appropriation was less than that of a year ago though it was apparent that there would be very many the outset of the annual appropriation, apparent to everybody that $60,000,000 more would be needed to carry on the work of more soldiers desiring vocational training and that it was, from the bureau. Am I stating the situation in a substantially correct manner?

Mr. WARREN. I have no disposition to dispute what the Senator says. I have already stated that the budget came down to Congress with an estimate for an appropriation of $65,000,000, as I recall, more than this bill contains.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why has the Senator's committee made the appropriation $40,000,000 instead of $60,000,000, may I ask?

Mr. WARREN. The estimate first went to the House of Representatives, and the House cut it down. It was stated to Representatives, and was reported to me, that it would be necessary to consider another deficiency measure later on, and there was no occasion to provide the entire sum at once as we should have again to act upon the question before March. I made inquiry if the budget officer had anything further to lay before the committee. We also had before the committee representatives of the Veterans' Bureau who stated that the amount carried by the pending bill would be all sufficient if we made further provision in the next bill, which I presume we shall have before us later on.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My remarks are not critical of the committee at all, but I wanted to point out the fact that this deficiency appropriation for vocational training is not more than was originally contemplated as necessary, but there was actually in the beginning an error in the appropriation, which I think was due to the neglect of the bureau in not watching the action of Congress. They needed $60,000,000 more from the very outset.

Mr. OVERMAN. The trouble is that when the departments send their estimates here the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and members of the committee say, "We will appropriate so much for this estimate." The amount estimated by the department was sufficient for this purpose, but instead of making the full appropriation $60,000,000 less than the estimate was provided. Now, we have before us an appropriation bill to provide for the deficit. That is the way it happens, and it happens in the case of practically all appropriation bills.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Federal Board for Vocational Training were charged before our committee with neglect, with not having studied the situation so as to make a correct estimate, but they denied that to be so. We could not understand why shortly after the appropriation bill had been passed they said, "There is going to be a deficit of $60,000,000," when the bill had just been signed. They have explained the matter in the manner which I have indicated.

I repeat that I did not rise to criticize the committee, but I was anxious to know whether the Federal Board had been so neglectful as not to have anticipated that there would be a deficiency of $40,000,000 under the appropriation which was given to them at the time the regular appropriation was provided for.

Mr. WARREN. I have not heard a word of criticism along that line. It is a straight matter of fact. The House committee and the House cut down the amount nearly one-half, because they said they would provide for it later in the session. In the case of this appropriation, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts knows, in the case of several others of the same kind, the requirements can not be always calculated upon accurately long beforehand. Their necessities can not be foreseen.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. WARREN. For instance, as to certain other lines, such as the case of foot-and-mouth-disease and sometimes in the case of cattle suffering from tuberculosis, it has become necessary to appropriate a great deal of money in appropriation bills. That is also true as to forest fires and matters of that kind, which we have tried to take care of from time to time, because it is entirely inadequate to undertake to provide that a certain amount shall last for a year as against incidents and accidents, tornadoes, fires, epidemics, and so forth, that may occur.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am personally gratified that the committee have recommended $40,000,000 and that they feel that the work of vocational rehabilitation can be done satisfactorily with that sum instead of $65,000,000.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming, some time ago caused to be read a letter pointing out the necessity of early action on the deficiency bill, which carries $100,000,000. While I do not say it is true in this case, it is a fact that in most legislative bodies in the States—and it has happened in the Congress—where there is something that is faulty, where there is something that it is hoped may be glossed over, where there is something that can not be explained or defended in a bill, the first plea made is for haste, and frequently the statement is made, "If you do not hurry, you will be charged with having starved the Government." The cry is "hurry."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, does not the Senator think I have been patient enough to-day?

Mr. ASHURST. The rules of the Senate require a bill to be read on three different days. It is the Senate that has been patient with the Senator from Wyoming. If we were not patient with the Senator, the rule would require the bill to be read on three different days. Sir, we are the patient ones.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not mean——

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator think he is exercising patience when he brings a hundred million dollar bill and endeavors to whip it through in one day? That is not patience. The bill under the rule, if objection is made, must be read three times—once on three different days or three times in all.

Mr. WARREN. It has been read all but the third time.

Mr. ASHURST. It has been read twice, but the third reading of the bill can be postponed to another day.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is entitled to put this bill over beyond the 15th day of the month if he desires to do so.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator think he is telling me something new? His remark would indicate that he hopes to impress somebody with the idea that I am delaying the bill and may perhaps starve the Government thereby. I wish, however, the learned Senator would tell me where in this bill the Public Health authorities or the Secretary of the Treasury or the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau are given any authority or where anybody is given authority to build new hospitals or to enlarge existing facilities for the hospitalization of soldiers. If the Senator will point to me an item where not only is the power granted to build new hospitals, but the money adequate to build them is provided I will be obliged to withdraw all I have said.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call the attention of the Senator to the language near the bottom of page 8, which, commencing in line 18, reads as follows:

The allotments—

That is, from the $25,000,000 appropriated on that page—

The allotments to the said Board of Managers shall also include such sums as may be necessary to alter, improve, or provide facilities in the several branches under its jurisdiction so as to furnish adequate accommodations for such beneficiaries of the United States Veterans' Bureau as may be committed to its care.

Mr. ASHURST. The provision the Senator has read, of course, is in the bill, and I think the warm heart of the Senator from New York and the warm heart of the chairman of the committee would construe that language to mean that an additional hospital could be erected, say, at Phoenix.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the heart of the Senator from New York could not possibly construe the provision in that way.

Mr. ASHURST. That is just what I want to know. Where is the language in this bill which grants the Public Health authorities or the Veterans' Bureau the money to establish a hospital at Phoenix or Tucson?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator did not ask that question.

Mr. ASHURST. I said "new hospitals."

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator said new hospital facilities, and the language I have read provides for new hospital facilities; but it so happens that it provides for them at the National Soldiers' Homes. They are being provided there to-day, and the language I have quoted provides for additional hospital facilities at those same homes, one of which is in the balmy Southwest.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator was not in the Chamber, undoubtedly, when I pointed out that it is necessary to establish either by purchase, by construction, or otherwise a hospital in the Salt River Valley in Arizona.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York was in the Chamber when the Senator made his speech——

Mr. ASHURST. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But just a moment ago the Senator apparently challenged the Senator from Wyoming to point out anything in this bill which provided for additional hospitalization facilities for soldiers. I point to a place where the bill does provide for additional hospitalization facilities.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; I stand corrected, and I thank the Senator. Now, in all kindness, I will ask the Senator from Wyoming or any other Senator to tell me where in this bill there is any authority granted to the Public Health Service, the Treasury Department, or any other agency of the Government to establish a hospital at Phoenix, where there is none, and to pay for the construction of such a hospital? Is there any such authority in the bill? There is not.

The provision which my esteemed friend from New York read represents the crumbs that are left over, the amount that simply happens to be remaining which may be used upon existing hospitals for their alteration, enlargement, or repair. What I am seeking is eligible language which will command the Public Health authorities to erect hospitals where the soldiers are and where the soldiers are going.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator at all familiar with the character of the new hospitals that have been put up at the soldiers' homes?

Mr. ASHURST. Frankly, I am not, personally.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought not, or the Senator would not have made that last observation.

Mr. ASHURST. I confess my inadequacies and my delinquencies. I do not dodge them. I say I am not familiar with the hospital facilities at the soldiers' homes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it due to the Senator's unfamiliarity with that subject that he refers to those hospital facilities as crumbs?

Mr. ASHURST. No; not at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is it due to?

Mr. ASHURST. What I meant was that the sums of money that are to be expended for the enlargement of hospitals are mere chips and whetstones; they are such small amounts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know that at these homes new hospitals have been erected and hundreds of beds added, with the most modern facilities?

Mr. ASHURST. I know that; yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know that that language is to enable the work to be continued?

Mr. ASHURST. That is very true, and I am not complaining about that. I ask that it go further. I ask that not only the hospital facilities at soldiers' homes and the existing hospitals be continued, but that new hospitals be built. That is my contention, and I say the language is not eligible to do that. The present language is not eligible to create new hospitals, to build new ones, or to buy new ones.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, it does not create new hospitals at Phoenix, Ariz.

Mr. ASHURST. That is just where I want them built.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So I understood.

Mr. ASHURST. And I am entirely unembarrassed in arguing for hospitals in Arizona. I am not fearful that it will be charged that I am trying to have money spent in my State. I am not a timid man. I suppose that might deter some shrinking, modest, lilylike Senator from New York, but it would not deter me. If soldiers desire to be hospitalized in Arizona or Arkansas or New York, I am ready to vote for adequate funds to hospitalize them.

My friend from New York is familiar with the Southwest. I do not need to argue to the Senator from New York this matter. He knows the Southwest. Do I need to tell him that, whether erroneously or not, the general public believes that the Southwest is a great specific for tuberculosis? We must leave it to physicians to say whether or not that is a correct impression, but the Senator knows that that is true. It would be a reflection upon the Senator's frankness for him to say that he did not know that the Southwest is generally regarded as a good place for hospitalization in cases of tuberculosis.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not said anything of the sort.

Mr. ASHURST. Now then, what I am seeking is this, and only this—that adequate funds shall be appropriated for the hospitalization of soldiers.

Senators, I do not know whether this appeals to you or not, but I have never been unfairly critical in a partisan way during my term of service as a Senator. I do not believe there is a Senator here who will say that I display more than necessary partisanship. Certainly I never have been offensively partisan. Many of the gentlemen who furnished me the information as to the necessity for these hospitals in Arizona are not members of my party.

I am unable to get an answer from the chairman of the committee, so I will repeat the question to him: In this bill is there any provision for the establishment of hospitals in Arizona, or any other part of the Southwest, for the hospitalization of soldiers?

Of course the Senator can talk with other Senators. He can disregard my question. I have been accustomed to practising law, where the witness was required to give attention to the question, but I can not require the consideration of questions here. Now, since I can not require his attention, I know that the courtesy of the Senator from Wyoming will cause him to answer my question. Is there any provision in this bill which will grant the authority to construct hospitals in the Southwest, and to pay for their construction, for the hospitalization of ex-soldiers?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator knows about the $18,600,000 appropriation that I spent a good deal of time over and held up an appropriation bill for some weeks to bring about. It has been allocated, a large portion of it, but not expended; but there is a little less than a million dollars that has not been allocated and could be spent to-morrow in Arizona, if the Senator could convince those who have the power of allocating that money that it should be put to that use; and I dare say the Senator can do that upon his representation of conditions as they are.

Mr. ASHURST. That is an honest and frank answer, and I am going to analyze it.

It is true that all of this $18,600,000 has been allocated or spent except about $700,000; and, I repeat, I do not charge that any of it has been improperly spent. The only complaint I make is that there was some delay in expending it. I believe that every dollar of it was honestly spent; but as to the $700,000 still remaining, the Secretary of the Treasury announces that there might be some defect in the plans here or there; might be some breakdown in the construction of these hospitals, and that as a matter of prudence, as a matter of wisdom and business judgment, he must keep on hand a balance to be immediately available if there should be a breakdown or a defect in construction somewhere. So, I say to my friend the Senator from Wyoming, that $700,000 balance is, for practical purposes, unavailable for the construction of new hospitals. Therefore, it requires an act of Congress; it requires a new and additional appropriation, because the Secretary of the Treasury will not use this reserve fund. His reserve is growing smaller every day. He has a large number of hospitals under construction, some 50 per cent built, some 90 per cent built, and some entirely built. You can not escape the force of his reasoning when he says:

> I must have a reasonable amount of money on hand to pay for accidents or deficiencies that may occur.

So I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming again, Is there in this bill any authority to construct additional hospitals and to pay for their construction? There is not. Now, I ask the Senator——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has answered the question himself.

Mr. ASHURST. I wanted the Senator to say that. I wanted it to appear in the RECORD that I was not going through the idle and empty performance of urging appropriations when the Congress had already taken care of the matter.

I am not one who has talked about extravagance. Senators, I talked with a high official five days ago. He said, "In some evil day the Democrats may come into power again, 20 years from now, and you will point to our extravagances in building these hospitals." I said, "I am sorry you said that. It was cowardice of officialdom, the fear of making mistakes, that led to the fatal, tragic tumble-down in the aircraft program during the war. It was the fear of criticism that first led to the lamentable and scandalous failure in the aircraft program."

Senators, if we are to be criticized, I would prefer to be criticized for having appropriated for too many hospitals rather than for not appropriating for enough. I have here on the floor of the Senate this afternoon made serious statements, and that, if false, should brand me as a falsifier before the country and the Senate as well. I challenge contradiction of the figures I have given. I ask any committee to call any reputable man or woman in Arizona, and they will bear out what I have said. I ask and implore your honorable committee to go to Arizona, and if they do not find the situation far worse than I have made it out or tried to show it to you, I shall be very much surprised.

My distinguished friend tells me that there is in the deficiency bill no appropriation, no language, eligible to be employed to give authority to the proper officers of the Government to construct additional hospitals for tubercular soldiers. If that be true, and we are unable to put on an amendment here, then it means that several hundred ex-service men who added new luster to our stainless standards, who carried our banner through the iron storm of war, will come home and die as rats on the desert because we sat here and would not appropriate the proper funds. That is the situation into which we will be drifting. It is a position that I do not intend to occupy if I can prevent it. I have warned my brother Senators in private conversation and in public speech of this situation. Long before I made this speech I begged, implored, and besought them to correct the situation; and yet in this bill we find not a single dollar that will give the Public Health Service authorities or the Veterans' Bureau the power to build or to buy additional hospitals for tubercular soldiers.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to interfere if the Senator has not completed his remarks, but some of his remarks I think upon reconsideration he will find are rather extravagant.

If I understood the Senator aright—and I am sure I did—he stated that there were at various places hospitals for tubercular patients that were open and containing many empty beds. He stated that there were drifting into Phoenix, Ariz., soldiers who wished to be admitted to the hospitals there without having applied to the Public Health Service or otherwise, and whose applications had not been properly passed on. Suppose all of our soldiers should insist that they should go to some one hospital.

Would the Senator undertake overnight, as you might say—for it takes time to draw plans and build big hospitals—without anything back of it, without any statement from the departments wanting it, withtout any statement from the regular service that has the matter in hand, say that we must appropriate to build a new building, costing some millions of dollars, in Arizona for Arizona's benefit because there may be soldiers that prefer that location to some other place?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has asked me a fair question. He is a good business man. I can not answer it all at once. The Senator has asked me two or three different questions.

First, you are not building the hospital for Arizona's benefit. I do not want to hear that any more. It is the soldiers from Massachusetts, it is the soldiers from New York, and from Illinois and Ohio for whose benefit hospitals would be built. It is not for the benefit of Arizona's soldiers alone, but it is for the benefit of those boys who in other climates have heard of the healing air of the Southwest and have gone there, not by the scores, Senators, but by the hundreds. Now, the Senator says if 1,500 soldiers should go to Phoenix or Tucson or some other town in the Southwest, or some place in New Mexico or southern California, would I build a hospital upon what you might say was their whim?

Senators, that is a question for us to consider. Sick soldiers believe they will recover their health there, and think when you send them to other places you have murdered them. Shall you, in your humanitarian impulses, listen to them or shall you compel them to go elsewhere to what they believe is death?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator were the chairman of an appropriation committee would he say, if he were asked the question, that regardless of all the hospitals we have, regardless of all the money we are expending, regardless of all the care that has been taken, we must be guided entirely by the say-so of certain soldiers who want to go to a certain point, rather than to take the advice of those who have the matter regularly in charge and the advice of all the noted surgeons and medical men, who are working for the best interests of their patients?

Mr. ASHURST. Whose life are you trying to save?

Mr. WARREN. I am trying to save the Senator's, but I fear——

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, no; you are trying to save the soldier's life. That is what you are trying to save. I hope no Senator will say we are trying to save dollars. We drafted these boys and sent them against flame and shell. Meanwhile we screened from the public the amount of billions the profiteers made. We published to the world the list of the boys that escaped the draft; then we refused to publish to the world the list of the millionaires' dollars that escaped the draft. If a considerable number of soldiers desired a hospital, and that expression was firm and clear, and was reinforced by the judgment of all the people that a certain place would have them, I would vote for the appropriation as chairman of the committee, and I would bring in the bill and I would say to the opposition: "I defy you to criticize so meritorious a bill."

What we need now is a little courage; it will not take much, just about as much courage as it takes to get up and take a bath in the morning when the bugle sounds; that is about all, just a little willingness to share criticism, if it comes, and you will thus save the lives of many bright-eyed boys from Wyoming, from Massachusetts, from New York, and from other States who have come into Arizona, our governor says, by the hundreds. They come on every train. They are afflicted with tuberculosis, and they come there to be cured. They are afflicted with neuropsychiatry at times, which is a disease that causes restlessness. Do you wonder these boys wandered from place to place looking for a cure? Did you ever go into a hospital where there were gassed soldiers? If so, you never will wish to go again; you will recall them gasping for breath, you will realize that segments of the lungs are burned and torn away, and in their pitiful and horrible struggles to get pure air into the remaining portion of the lung they will limn before you a picture from which you would be glad to escape.

So I want it understood that in this bill there is no money appropriated to enable the Public Health Service or the Veterans' Bureau to create new hospitals. I want to pin somebody down, somewhere, sometime. You can play ping-pong in the parlors of the dilettante, and you can play ping-pong in politics, but you are not going to play ping-pong with the wounded soldier. It would not have been polite for me to have spoken as I did to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and I apologize to him now for the rather unnecessary remark I made to him. I am no more of a friend to the soldier than anybody else is.

I have laid before you a state of facts that ought to cause you to pause, and ought to cause you to investigate further, and to say to your special committee, "Call the witness, and see whether the Senator from Arizona has correctly stated the facts," for I have challenged anyone to deny what I have said here.

Call the witnesses. Call the governor; call the judges; call the members of the legislature; and call the members of the chambers of commerce; call Director Forbes; call Maj. Louis T. Grant, Mr. Milliken; call the editor of the Daily Gazette; call the editor of the Arizona Republican, and they will tell you that men are walking around on the desert and on the streets, objects of charity, appealing to people for hospitalization, and are being told, "Oh, go to Walla Walla. Oh, go to New York. Go to Oshkosh. They have a hospital for you up in Chicago, with many beds and few patients there. Go where the beds are." But the soldier shares the view which so many share, to wit, that he must have a good climate to arrest the progress of his disease.

I do not want to delay the consideration of this bill, but I ask the Senator from Wyoming to permit me to have a vote on my amendment, which is to strike from the bill the $1,000,000 to erect monumental buildings in Rio de Janeiro, and to use that sum for the hospitalization of soldiers, where the Director of the Veterans' Bureau sees fit. Will the Senator let me have a vote on that?

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's request?

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator permit me to have a vote on my amendment, which proposes to strike from the bill the provision for $1,000,000 for the erection of monumental buildings in Rio de Janeiro, and use that sum for the hospitalization of gassed and tubercular soldiers?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we have a unanimous-consent agreement to go on with the bill and finish the Senate committee amendments, and I will then consider with the Senator any amendment he may have to offer. I do not suppose the Senator cares whether he knocks out the Brazil matter or whether he does not; but he wants $1,000,000, as I understand it, for an Arizona hospital.

Mr. ASHURST. I will not say for an Arizona hospital. The Senator should not say that.

Mr. WARREN. A hospital, then, at that point.

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President. Will not the Senator put it this way, in the language of the amendment, that the $1,000,000 shall be spent by the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau for hospitalization of soldiers wherever he sees fit?

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator had it, the amendment is legislation, and a point of order would lie against it. If he simply wishes to get an appropriation of $1,000,000 for some hospital at some point, I could, of course, consistently allow that to go to a vote, although it could be ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, I will offer the amendment——

Mr. WARREN. No; not now. Let me insist that when we have a Senate unanimous-consent agreement, we fulfill that agreement, and go on with the bill. Then, when we have finished with the committee amendments, we can take up these other amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think we ought to proceed with this bill in an orderly manner. We have now been here an hour and a half, and heard three speeches on the same topic by the same person.

Mr. ASHURST. You have heard three speeches on the same topic from the same person, and you will hear very many more speeches on the same topic from the same person, and it may be ultimately that that person will drive an idea into the head of the Senator from New York on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment of the committee is, on page 3, line 25, in the item for expenses in connection with closing up the business of the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation, to strike out "$6,650" and insert in lieu thereof "$8,000."

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 4, after line 16, to insert:

Employees' compensation fund: For carrying out the provisions of section 11 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, extending to the employees of the government of the District of Columbia the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, $4,000.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether the appropriation made for the fiscal year on this particular subject has been exhausted already?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; that is the state of affairs.

Mr. KING. I can not understand how the officials of the Government, having a year before them, should exhaust within a very few months the entire appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. That is one of the class I tried to set before the Senate in the proper light. There are certain things it is impossible to calculate and appropriate for beforehand. The size of that compensation fund just depends on how many may be injured. In six months 5 men may have been injured and at another period in three months 25 were injured. We have to provide money for whatever that commission may certify is due to these injured Government employees.

Mr. KING. I have not read the testimony which is the basis of this item, but I have read considerable testimony in the past, and that tended to show a substantial uniformity. Of course, with the increase in the number of employees who would be entitled to compensation, manifestly the amount from year to year would necessarily have to be augmented; but with a substantial uniformity in these appropriations I can not understand how the appropriation would be exhausted in so short a time. However, I suppose the Senator has the evidence tending to show that it has been exhausted.

Mr. WARREN. At the time the estimate was made it was a balance of only nine hundred dollars and something, but that was some time ago.

Mr. KING. I make no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment of the committee is, at the top of page 5, in the items for the District of Columbia, to insert:

Public schools: For furniture and equipment, including clocks and window shades, for the four-room addition to the Henry D. Cook School, $2,893.75.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 19 on page 6.

Mr. WARREN. I offer a committee amendment relating to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has been estimated for and comes in proper form but was not included in the bill as reported.

The READING CLERK. On page 6, after line 19, insert the following:

Bureau of Safety: To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep informed regarding and to enforce compliance with the acts to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads; the act requiring common carriers to make reports of accidents and authorizing investigations thereof; and to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and test block-signal systems and appliances intended to promote the safety of railway operation, as authorized by the joint resolution approved June 30, 1906, and the appropriation of the sundry civil act approved May 27, 1908, including the same objects specified in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, and to take care of additional duties placed upon the commission by the transportation act, 1920, $36,400.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to that appropriation; indeed, with the information which I have I am inclined to think it is proper. But this is what I want to ask the Senator. Perhaps it is in violation of our unanimous-consent rule, but it will save recurring to the matter again. I direct attention to the item ending on line 10, page 6, for $300,000, appropriated to the Interstate Commerce Commission for expenditures necessary in execution of laws to regulate commerce, to take care of additional duties, and so on. That is a deficit. Half the year has not expired, and I ask the Senator if the large sum which was appropriated in the general appropriation bill has been exhausted and we are compelled at this early date to make this additional appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice that this is for 1920 and relates to one of the lump-sum appropriations. We appropriate millions of dollars for certain purposes. Attorneys and others go here, there, and other places, and the vouchers of their expenses are not received until after the end of the year, after the money balance has gone back to the Treasury. Then we have to appropriate the next year for things of that kind.

Mr. KING. I did not notice that this was for 1920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 7, beginning in line 22, to strike out the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of the foregoing appropriation shall be expended for construction work (except necessary minor repairs) at any Army camp acquired by the United States Veterans' Bureau for use as a training center.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment of the committee is, on page 9, after line 14, to insert the following:

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

General expenses: To enable the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, to perform the duties imposed upon it by the Agricultural appropriation act approved March 3, 1921, for the payment of indemnities on account of cattle slaughtered in connection with the eradication of tuberculosis from animals, $400,000.

Mr. WARREN. I offer a committee amendment to enlarge the appropriation and the total.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 9, line 21, strike out "$400,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600,000."

Mr. KING. I would like to have some explanation of that item. The Agricultural Department a few years ago was receiving four or five or six million dollars a year. The appropriation is now between thirty and forty million dollars per annum. The year has not expired, just a few months of the year have passed, and we are asked now for an additional appropriation, a deficit, of $400,000, which has been raised by the amendment which has been tendered to $600,000. I ask the Senator what reason there is for this appropriation?

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator understands that the law provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may take steps looking to the prevention of that disease and its cure, in connection with the States, and the way most of the States arrange is that an animal found affected with tuberculosis is appraised, the owner stands one-third; the State, under this appropriation, pays one-third and the Government pays one-third. Tuberculosis is confined now to a few States, but is very prevalent in some. They are now at a point where unless we appropriate we will be in the position of entering a man's barnyard and condemning and killing his cow without having the wherewith to pay for it.

In looking the matter over and getting the best information we can from the States, we believe the amount is necessary. That is one of the amounts, like the other, which depends upon the situation from time to time. It can not be calculated a year or two ahead.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator whether the $600,000 is to be used entirely for the object just indicated by him? My understanding is that a considerable portion of it is for other purposes, to pay compensation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is all indemnities.

Mr. KING. I mean compensation of employees.

Mr. WARREN. There might be the compensation of the inspectors on the ground, but they are taken care of otherwise. This is all for indemnities.

Mr. KENYON. The Secretary of Agriculture estimated $900,000 for indemnities. The budget commission cut it to $600,000. So this is the amount estimated for in the budget, and it is a very necessary appropriation.

Mr. KING. As the Senator knows, the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1922 carried more than $36,000,000, and there was a very large sum in that bill for this very purpose, as I recall.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; a considerable sum.

Mr. KING. Has that all been exhausted?

Mr. KENYON. Oh, yes; it is exhausted. This matter has gotten down to some four or five States, where it is very bad indeed, and the system of apportionment is such that those States are absolutely with nothing. The Senator can see the injustice of the whole proposition of killing the cattle and the owners getting no indemnity.

Mr. KING. I could not conceive of appropriations for this year having been exhausted from the 1st of July to the present time.

Mr. KENYON. The State contributes, as the Senator knows, in these cases.

Mr. KING. Yes; I know, and I would not have been surprised if a deficiency appropriation had been brought in along in March or April or May, but to bring in one now, when just a few months of the fiscal year 1922 has elapsed, is rather surprising to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. One explanation is this, if the Senator will allow me. As the Senator from Wyoming said, it is almost impossible to anticipate exactly how much money is to be expended under an appropriation of this kind from month to month, and it is almost impossible to draw a dividing line between fiscal years with such accuracy and assurance that not a dollar appropriated for the fiscal year 1921 shall be expended in the fiscal year 1922, and not a dollar appropriated for the fiscal year 1922 shall be expended in the fiscal year 1923.

Under this system the dairy herds are given two tests, as I understand it. If the second test shows an absence of bovine tuberculosis, the herd is passed clear and credited as a clean herd. A large number of herds are in process of being passed on between the first and second tests. About 10,000 herds have been cleaned up and certified as clean. There are something like 72,000 herds, as I recall, still to be passed on finally. If this appropriation is not made, all the work stops in the six or seven States where the greater number of herds are concentrated and the money that has already been spent in the first test will have been wasted and no good will have been accomplished. As a matter of fact, this is one of the most useful activities the Government has embarked upon. I know that the State of New York has spent years at this work. The work was inaugurated when I was a member of the State legislature. The State reimburses the farmer according to certain schedules of payment, reimbursing him in part for the animals that are killed. The Federal Government has stepped in in recent years to assist the State in the matter. The States put up three times as much as the Federal Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 12, beginning in line 14, to strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $4,500 per annum and only one person may be employed at the rate of $4,500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Department of the Interior," on page 13, after line 6, to insert:

PATENT OFFICE.

Salaries: For additional employees from January 1 to June 30, 1922, both dates inclusive, as follows: Law examiner, $2,750; examiners of trade-marks and designs—3 first assistants, at $2,400 each; 6 second assistants, at $2,100 each; 4 third assistants, at $1,800 each; examiners—2 principals, at $2,700 each; 6 first assistants, at $2,400 each; 6 second assistants, at $2,100 each; 6 third assistants, at $1,800 each; 6 fourth assistants, at $1,500 each; clerks—4 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 4 of class 1; in all, $52,975.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 17, to insert:

Printing and binding: For binding German and other foreign patents and periodicals for Scientific Library, $30,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether there is any law authorizing these additional employees, or is this new legislation?

Mr. WARREN. There is merely the general law which provides for sufficient employees along this line, and this is to conform to the requirements. Of course, in the Patent Office they are away behind in their work and have to have help. Meantime the so-called Patent Office bill which proposes to increase amounts and raise all these salaries is lodged in the brush on the wayside somewhere, but the work is accumulating down there to such an extent that they should have this help. They have been cut down heretofore.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether the employees named herein are already in the service of the Government?

Mr. WARREN. No; they are not.

Mr. KING. This means taking on a large number of additional employees?

Mr. WARREN. That is my understanding of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Employment service," on page 19, after line 20, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Labor, during the present unemployment emergency, to augment the existing facilities of the United States Employment Service in facilitating the transportation of labor from one State to another, inform States in which there is scarcity of labor of the situation in States where there is surplus of labor of the kind desired, and securing, compiling, and publishing information on unemployment throughout the country, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official station, together with their per diem in lieu of subsistence, allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; rent of quarters outside of the District of Columbia; supplies and equipment, telegraph and telephone service, and printing and binding, $100,000.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Postal Service," on page 21, after line 10, to insert:

For miscellaneous items necessary and incidental to post offices of the first and second classes, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I see a large number of items aggregating nearly $7,000,000 for the Post Office Department. As I have stated repeatedly, we have but recently entered upon the fiscal year 1922, and yet we are confronted with a deficit of nearly $7,000,000 in the Post Office Department. There has been a great deal of talk about economies that the Postmaster General was effectuating in improved service, but notwithstanding the enormous appropriation which was made of hundreds of millions of dollars we are asked now to appropriate nearly $7,000,000 to meet a deficiency. I should like to know how it is possible that the enormous appropriations made for that department could have been expended and we should have deficits so soon. At this rate we shall have a deficit two or three or four times that amount before the expiration of the fiscal year.

Mr. WARREN. I will not say that I regret to see, because I ought not to regret it, but I expect to see these post-office matters come in this way for all time as long as history records its annals, because of the situation existing. In the first place, the Senator will observe that part of this is for past years.

There are certain expenditures which have been made and certain obligations that have to be met. Before all the accounts can get here and be audited, the end of the fiscal year comes and another year begins, and the money goes back into the Treasury, and we have to reappropriate to meet those items. Those items in a sense do not mean that we are spending any additional money beyond the appropriations originally made.

That is one side of the question. On the other side of it we go on from time to time with legislation providing that the Post Office Department shall carry on additional activities, like the parcel post, the postal routes, and the postal banks, and the carriage through post-office transportation of almost everything except babies, although they do send live animals. No matter what we appropriate, the increased business during the year, to the extent we have had it in the past, always requires helping out in this way. For instance, with reference to the parcel post, we raised the limit of weight that might be admitted within certain zones, and, of course, we increased the amount of merchandise carried in that way, and that requires extra supervision, and so forth.

Then comes the matter of settling for damages and shortages. It is difficult to tell, on the other hand, what those will amount to. I am speaking generally now, without reference to the particular items. This is one of the departments where the money comes back, where we are supposed to get about as much back as we pay out, and when they say to us that it requires very large appropriations, they appear very large, as the Senator has said, but they are extremely necessary.

Mr. KING. Are any steps being taken by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads for the purpose of increasing the revenue derived from the operation of the Post Office Department? I ask because these deficits seem to be continuing. We have been told repeatedly that the deficits amount to $70,000,000 for postage alone. These additional amounts for losses by reason of carrying parcel post, and so forth, will make the deficit in the Post Office Department perhaps $100,000,000.

May I ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], who is also a member of the Committee on Appropriations and a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, what steps are being taken to recoup some of the losses resulting from the operation of the Post Office Department?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I do not know of any definite program that is being considered except that a study is being made to ascertain the cost of handling parcel post as compared to second-class and third-class mail matter; also in connection with first class, where we know that a greater margin of profit, if there is any, exists.

Referring to these deficits, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that under this deficiency bill $4,160,000, in round figures, relates to the year 1921 and not to the current fiscal year.

In reference to deficiencies, officials of the Post Office Department and of other departments endeavor to estimate in advance the amounts which will be required to carry on their activities, but the business of the departments is growing all the time, and it is practically a physical impossibility for any body of men to figure on the 1st of September of this year, for instance, what is going to be required for expenditure from the 1st of July, 1922, until the 1st of July, 1923. It is possible only to make an approximate estimate of the amount which will be needed. Departmental officers are required under the law to avoid deficiencies. When they discover at about this time of the year that their business has grown and that the estimate submitted for the year 1922 was insufficient, it is quite proper for them to report what additional amounts will be required in order to avoid a deficiency. Such items are supplemental estimates, properly speaking; they are not true deficiencies. Under our understanding in the Committee on Appropriations, a deficiency is an expenditure created over and above the amount authorized. The department in this instance is attempting to show to Congress that the amounts already authorized are inadequate and insufficient. Therefore they are submitting these supplemental estimates.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 22, after line 3, to insert:

For the operation and maintenance of the airplane mail service between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., via Chicago, Ill., and Omaha, Nebr., including necessary incidental expenses and employment of necessary personnel, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 26, to change the total appropriation for the Office of Second Assistant Postmaster General from $3,599,482.66 to $3,849,482.66.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Secretary be authorized to make any corrections of totals in the bill which may be necessary by reason of the adoption of amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 23, line 5, to change the total appropriation for the Postal Service from $6,525,934.08 to $6,825,934.08.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Treasury Department," on page 26, after line 17, to insert:

Division of Customs: For salaries and expenses of Dye and Chemical Section from November 27, 1921, to June 30, 1922, $17,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 19, to insert:

COAST GUARD.

For payment of damages caused by collision of Coast Guard cutter Manning with the schooner Alice May Davenport, belonging to Acostia & Cia, $110.

Mr. WARREN. On page 30 I desire to propose an amendment, which I send to the desk, being merely a transposition of language in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30 it is proposed to transpose the amendment just agreed to, being the clause from line 20 to line 23, inclusive, to follow line 19.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "War Department," on page 31, after line 6, to insert:

OFFICE OF CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

For replacing the worn-out portions of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system, $1,500,000, to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 10, to insert:

Inland and port storage and shipping facilities: For completing the acquisition of certain land near Fairmont, W. Va., from John F. Phillips, and expenses incident thereto, the Secretary of War is authorized to expend $29,750 from the sum of $7,000,000 pertaining to the appropriation "Inland and port storage and shipping facilities," the expenditure of which after June 30, 1921, was authorized by the Army appropriation act approved June 30, 1921, and reappropriated.

Mr. WARREN. There is another transposition which I desire to suggest, on page 31, occasioned by a slight mistake which was made in the printing of the bill.

The READING CLERK. On page 31 it is proposed to transpose the amendment just stated, embraced in lines 11 to line 19, inclusive, so as to follow line 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the transposition will be made, and, without objection, the amendment of the committee is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 32, after line 7, to insert:

UNEXPENDED BALANCES.

The unexpended balances of the appropriations chargeable with the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department consequent upon the suspension of hostilities and with the adjustment of claims under the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, as provided in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1921, are hereby made available until June 30, 1922, for the payment of any award made by the Secretary of War under the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, without reference to the purpose of the original appropriations from which the said unexpended balances are taken.

Mr. WARREN. The committee have an amendment to offer in place of the entire amendment running from line 8 to line 24, inclusive, on page 32. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 32 it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out lines 8 to 24, inclusive, and inserting:

PAYMENT OF AWARD.

The unexpended balances of appropriations made available by the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1921, approved June 16, 1921, for the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department consequent upon the suspension of hostilities and with the adjustment of claims under the act approved March 2, 1919, shall be available for the payment of an award made by the Secretary of War in the sum of $550,000 in favor of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd, being the only existing unsatisfied award made under said act.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this amendment has a bearing upon the appropriations which were made available by the act referred to in the amendment, the second deficiency act for the fiscal year 1921, approved June 16, 1921, for the relief of the so-called war-mineral claimants, on account of claims which grew out of the production, at the request of the Government, of chrome, manganese, and other so-called war metals. By the act of March 2, 1919, $8,500,000 were made available out of the appropriation of the act of the previous year for the payment of those claims. That appropriation was continued in effect by the act of June 16, 1921, which I have just mentioned.

A number of awards have been made to these so-called war-mineral claimants which have not been settled because of the fact that the claimants were not satisfied with the amount that was awarded them. There has been passed an act of Congress, which was approved November 23, 1921, only a few days ago, providing for a rehearing and resubmission of these awards to the Secretary of the Interior through a commission provided by law for a determination of the amount that may be due them under the interpretation given to the previous act by Congress in its recent act of November 23, 1921. I say that this amendment has a bearing upon that situation in this respect: It proposes to take money out of the fund that was made available for the payment of the awards which I have described to the extent of $550,000 to pay the claim cited in the amendment of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd, and it contains the assertion—a very curious thing to put in legislation, and, I think, entirely inappropriate, being a mere recital—"being the only existing unsatisfied award made under said act."

It is not "the only existing unsatisfied award made under said act," because, as I have just stated, there are a number of awards which have been made and are pending under that act on account of the so-called war-mineral claims. I ask the Senator from Wyoming to agree to eliminate from his amendment the concluding words, "being the only existing unsatisfied award made under said act." I reserve the right to make the point of order against it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Washington and eliminate the language of which he speaks.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Except as to those words, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to come in on page 34.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 34, in lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out the words "present session" and insert in lieu thereof "first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "judgments, United States courts," on page 34, after line 18, to insert:

For payment of the final judgments and decrees, including costs of suits, which have been rendered under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," certified to Congress during the present session by the Attorney General in Senate Document No. 81, and which have not been appealed, namely:

Under the War Department, $4,371.80, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on the respective judgments at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date thereof until the time this appropriation is made.

Mr. WARREN. I offer an amendment to the amendment. The amendment is made necessary by reason of the fact that the bill was considered and acted upon by the House of Representatives in the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, but now we are in the second session of that Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 34, in lines 23 and 24, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "present session" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer another amendment, to come in on page 35.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 36, line 6, after the word "at," it is proposed to strike out "its present session" and insert in lieu thereof "the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer an amendment to the amendment to come in on page 47.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 47, line 11, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to strike out the words "at its present session," and to insert "during the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 54, line 21, to change the number of the section from "3" to "4."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, in behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], who is necessarily absent, I offer a meritorious amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the city of Baltimore, Md., $202,022.99, in settlement of a claim growing out of moneys paid by the city of Baltimore during the Civil War in the construction of works of defense in and around that city. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The READING CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $202,022.99, being the balance due said city for amounts advanced and expenses incurred and paid, arising out of the request of Maj. Gen. R. C. Schenck, United States Army, dated June 20, 1863, to aid the United States in the construction of works of defense in and around the city of Baltimore during the Civil War.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall have to make a point of order against the amendment. In the first place, in the form of a bill it is now pending before the Committee on Claims, but has not been reported by that committee. Furthermore, the rules of the Senate provide that claims shall not be permitted on appropriation bills. The amendment presented by the Senator from Maryland relates to a claim of the old times, growing out of the Civil War, which has been before the Committee on Claims for a number of years, but which has not reached a point where it can be recognized as in order on an appropriation bill. I therefore make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if this is the appropriate time I offer an amendment, and I am going to be very brief with respect to it, because I have already trespassed, perhaps, too long on the time of the Senate. My amendment simply proposes to appropriate $1,000,000 to be placed in the hands of Director Forbes, of the Veterans' Bureau, and to be spent in the further hospitalization of soldiers wherever the director sees fit. The language I have employed is a rescript of the bill which Director Forbes drew, the amount being reduced, however, to $1,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, the amendment simply provides an appropriation of $1,000,000 for hospital purposes?

Mr. ASHURST. For hospitalization, to be expended under the direction of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. I shall not object to the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Let the amendment be read. I think it ought to be read. I will then withdraw the other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 9, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau, by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, such hospitals and out-patient dispensary facilities to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, and accessories, and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel, and the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named therein. Such hospital plants shall be of fireproof construction, and the location and nature thereof, whether for the treatment of tuberculosis, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

That for carrying into effect this provision relating to additional hospital facilities there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask a question or two about this amendment?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he has not legislative matter in there, and if he cares to have that carried? If it is simply a straight matter of appropriation, it would, of course, be one thing; but if it involves legislation, it is rather different.

Mr. ASHURST. I conceive it to be important that this money should be placed at the disposal of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, Col. Forbes. He drew the bill originally and provided for $16,000,000. The language that is employed there, he employed first. It is true that the amendment carries legislation, and would be subject, I suppose, to a point of order; but the object of my argument this afternoon has been to try to direct it to the point that Director Forbes is convinced that it should be done. I have a report in my office on my very bill, where he says that $16,000,000 is necessary.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will not talk so long that I will have to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I will quit. I am through.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to say that under the rules of the House, of course, a point of order will be raised there. I am not going to raise the point myself at this time if the Senator will avoid incorporating legislation in the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I call attention to one phase of this amendment which I think the Senator may have overlooked? He provides that "such hospital plants shall be of fireproof construction." Is it really true that the emergency at Phoenix requires that the hospitals to be built there or elsewhere shall be of fireproof construction?

Mr. ASHURST. That is a wise suggestion, and I will ask that that language be stricken out. The Senator's judgment is excellent. I ask that that language be stricken out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a form of hospital construction for tuberculosis patients, of the pavilion type, which is most excellent, and the danger from fire is next to nothing.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct. It was due to my haste that I overlooked striking that out, and I thank the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to my friend that when a matter goes in on the floor of the Senate, I consider myself instructed to protect it in conference; but, as the Senator knows, no Senator can State beforehand that he can stand all the fires of conference. I will do the best I can with it. That is all I can say. We may not be able to protect this particular item.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has always been fair, and the Senator has always been frank, and I believe he will manfully stand and contest for this amendment in the conference. I believe that.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, just for the RECORD, I should like to call attention to the fact that of the $18,600,000 which is authorized to be expended for hospitalization there has been allocated to Prescott, Ariz., $600,000; to Fort Bayard, N. Mex., $850,000; to Fort Logan H. Roots, Little Rock, Ark., $250,000; and to Palo Alto, Calif., $1,500,000.

I think it is only fair to the Treasury Department, which has had in charge the locating of these hospitals and the distribution or allocation of the $18,600,000, to call attention to the fact that it has not been overlooking the southwestern country, although it has passed over Colorado, where I know and I think the Senator knows that we have three seekers for health to one that goes to Arizona to be cured of tuberculosis. I also want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that out of this appropriation $791,000 has been reserved for contingencies, not yet allocated. I want to say for myself that I believe beyond any question it will be found that the balance of $17,809,000 will be much more than sufficient for the hospitals that have been designed or laid out under this plan. In my humble opinion, the figures that have been set aside for the different buildings, based on the number of beds, are much higher than they should be. They are more than ample. I should say that those hospitals could be built for at least a million dollars less than the Treasury Department has estimated.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do.

Mr. McKINLEY. May I ask whether this legislation has given power to the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to make this expenditure?

Mr. PHIPPS. It has not. This $18,600,000 is under the Treasury Department.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I merely want to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that while it is true that $850,000 has been allocated to Fort Bayard, N. Mex., and contracts let, that amount will not place Fort Bayard in good condition. There are a number of buildings there which can not be replaced for that amount of money. I was speaking with the Architect of the Treasury a couple of days ago, and his estimate is that $900,000 more may be required for that work.

Mr. PHIPPS. It may be, but I should like to take the contract off the contractor's hands to-day.

Mr. BURSUM. The Senator from Colorado probably has not visited Fort Bayard. He probably has not seen the conditions that exist there. The buildings there are 30 years old or more. They are frame buildings. They are fire traps. They are used only because of the necessity. There is no economy in undertaking to keep up hospitals in that condition. There is need for that money and it ought to be appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] as modified.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Arizona, I will say that I have changed the language of that amendment. It formerly read:

Such hospital plants shall be of fireproof construction, and the location—

And so forth. I have stricken out the words—

Such hospital plants shall be of fireproof construction, and—

Leaving the sentence to read as follows:

The location and nature of such hospitals, whether for the treatment of tuberculous, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the director—

And so forth.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from New York. He is correct, and I accept the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, now that the amendment is out of the way, I will state that I have grave doubts whether we should have one of these hospitals built by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, and all the others built by the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committe of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 13, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 12, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, we linger where none but God can hear. We thank Thee for Thy abounding and unchanging love. Speak to our hearts and let them feel the kindling of Thy presence, and may they be pledged to a high sustaining purpose. O, bless our country; continue to light up the dark places of the world with heavenly light. How grateful we are that the spirit of righteousness, justice, and truth is falling upon the leaders from the ends of the earth like a sunburst breaking through a cloudland. O, abide with all of us in human sympathy and in heavenly peace. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 10, 1921, was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I request unanimous consent that on next Friday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for one hour on the subject of what the American people expect of this Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent on next Friday that he be allowed to address the House for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, some time ago and at various times the matter of fixing a date or time for addresses out of order and not upon the measures before Congress has been discussed. I think we all understand that it is the opinion of Members that these special privileges and arrangements for speeches out of order should not be agreed to unless there is some very urgent public reason for it. Gentlemen come to me almost every day and ask that I agree——

Mr. BLANTON. Well, if there is going to be objection, I withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker, to save time.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. To-day is District of Columbia day. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] is recognized.

MASONIC RELIEF ASSOCIATION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 6380.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill H. R. 6380, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6380) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 2, 3, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That membership in this association shall be limited to master Masons, and that the business and objects of the society or corporation shall be to provide, maintain, and disburse a fund for the benefit of the members, their wives, widows, children, orphans, dependents, heirs, assignees, legatees, or beneficiaries, and for this purpose it shall and may be lawful for the said society or corporation to make all and every insurance appertaining to or connected with life or disability risks of whatever kind and nature; and, in addition thereto, to provide, maintain, and disburse a fund for owning, establishing, maintaining, and operating homes, hospitals, sanitariums, and any other aid or service for its members, master Masons, their wives, widows, children, orphans, dependents, or beneficiaries; and because of its fraternal organization and benevolent purposes it shall be defined and classed as a fraternal beneficial society: Provided, however, That upon all contracts of insurance it shall maintain a reserve fund adequate to meet all liabilities thereon, and which in case of life risks shall be not less than that computed upon the American experience table of mortality at 4 per cent interest.

"SEC. 3. That the number of directors of said association shall be at least 21, a number of whom, less than a majority, shall be elected annually by the members of the association from among themselves and shall serve for three years. In all cases of a tie vote the choice to be determined by lot, and in all other cases a plurality vote shall decide. That the annual meeting of said association shall be held on the third Tuesday in February of each year, and said directors shall, at their first meeting succeeding the annual meeting of the association, elect one of their number to be president of the board of directors, who shall also be president of the association, and shall elect one of their number as vice president, and one of their number or a member of the association as secretary of the association, and the said secretary of the association shall give bond with surety to said association in such sum as the board of directors may require for the faithful discharge of his duties; and one of their number as treasurer, who shall also give bond with surety to said association in such sum as the said board of directors may require for the faithful discharge of his trust. At all meetings of the board of directors 12 members of the board shall form a quorum. In case of any vacancy in the board of directors, by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by the remaining directors from among the members of said association for the remainder of the unexpired term.

"SEC. 5. That the said board of directors may be increased from time to time to a number not exceeding the number of grand lodges of Masons in the United States, and the said board shall be capable of taking and holding the funds, property, and effects of said corporation, which funds, property, or effects shall forever be devoted to the purpose mentioned in section 2 hereof."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to extend the powers of the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia so that it may be privileged to extend relief to orphans and children and dependents in addition to the insurance that is received through the agency of the association.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this bill amends in three features the charter of the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia.

This association was incorporated in 1869. It was given permission under its charter to do a life insurance or a mutual relief business among members of the Masonic fraternity. The first charter gave the association very limited powers. It was limited in the amount of benefits it should pay to any beneficiary to $1 for each member of the association. The charter has been amended four or five times since that time, each amendment having in view making more liberal the charter and to enable the association to extend the benevolent work for which it was incorporated. At the present time this association is doing business in 37 States of the Union and has a membership of more than 40,000.

This bill changes the charter first in this respect: It will enable the association to do hospital work, to build sanitariums and hospitals, if it so chooses. It is not under its present charter permitted to do that kind of work. Nearly all the fraternal insurance associations of the country, by charter, are permitted to engage in that class of relief work, and it is a handicap on this association, which is doing business in 37 States, that it should not be permitted to engage in that kind of relief.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is this peculiarly a District of Columbia organization? Are its headquarters in Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Its headquarters are in Washington, but it does business throughout the Union.

Mr. TILSON. But why was it incorporated in the District of Columbia rather than in some State?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not answer that question. That was in 1869.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Was it not probably because it was desired to do business throughout the different States of the Union?

Mr. TILSON. As the gentleman knows, if it was incorporated in any State throughout the Union it would be just the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not many such organizations are incorporated in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that the incorporation laws of the District of Columbia provide for the organization of fraternal insurance companies, so that such fraternal insurance companies may do business throughout the various States the same as organizations incorporated under the laws of any of the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that is true. If this bill is enacted into law it will give this association the right to do hospital and relief work through sanitariums and along the lines practiced by other fraternal insurance companies.

It changes the charter in one other respect. At present the number of directors is fixed at 25. The charter fixes the number at not less than 21. But they have 25 directors, which is the number of lodges in the District of Columbia. It is proposed to amend the charter so that the number of directors shall not be greater than the number of grand lodges throughout the United States, which would be 48—one grand Masonic lodge for each of the several States. These directors are elected by members of the associations themselves, proxies not being voted, and the management of the association is absolutely in the hands of the membership.

It changes the charter in one other particular. At the present time the limit of the amount of insurance to any one beneficiary is $5,000. This bill removes that limit, so that the association will be enabled to write insurance as other companies do under the rules of insurance.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Was this association incorporated originally by an act of Congress?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and all the amendments to its charter have been by act of Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any law in the District now under which a company or association could incorporate to do a general business the same as in other States, or would it be required to have a special act of Congress if anybody wanted to start a new one?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know as to that.

Mr. LONDON. If I may answer that question, the law of the District of Columbia permits the organization of fraternal orders in the District of Columbia, with the right to do business everywhere else. In other words, they have almost the same insurance laws as any State in the Union.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand the difference between this and a general fraternal insurance organization.

Mr. LONDON. Neither do I. I do not know enough about this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This association was organized under a special charter, and they have had to come to Congress each time they wanted a change in their charter.

Another change that will be made is that the association will be permitted to write accident and benefit policies. They are not now permitted to do this under their present charter.

All the changes that are sought to be made in this bill make more liberal the charter under which this association can do business. It will enable them to render a more helpful service to the members of the association, and is necessary if the association is to progress and compete in this field of relief work with other fraternal and mutual relief and insurance associations.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Are there any changes suggested that take away from this association the mutual feature?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. TREADWAY. It remains entirely mutual?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely so. The only changes are those I have enumerated, increasing the number of directors to 48, taking away the limit of $5,000 on policies they may write, also to permit the writing of accident and benefit insurance, and for hospitalization and relief work.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then there will be no personal benefit or gain to any official.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at all. It does not change the charter in any respect as to that.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman give us any idea of the volume of business transacted by the association in the States enumerated?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not as to particular States, but in these 37 States there are more than 40,000 policyholders. It is quite a business.

Mr. MILLER. Forty thousand policies?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Forty thousand policyholders.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state if there is any limit fixed in the amount of insurance to any one individual, or does this just take off the $5,000 limit?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This takes off the $5,000 limit. I have here the original charter and the various amendments that have been made by act of Congress from time to time.

Mr. GERNERD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. GERNERD. Does this provision conflict with any State laws?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no. In fact, it gives this association the rights and powers which practically all the States have given to fraternal insurance associations.

Mr. GERNERD. It is similar in character?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Similar in character.

Mr. GERNERD. So it does not require them to register with each State in order to do business in it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; the State laws require that. This does not change or conflict with the State laws in any way.

Mr. GERNERD. What I am trying to get at is that there is nothing intended here that will in any way override any of those State provisions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at all. It simply enables this association, which is purely a mutual association, confined to members of the Masonic fraternity, to render a more helpful service to those seeking its benefits.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill was reported unanimously out of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in the last session by Senator NELSON, passed the Senate unanimously, was reported out of the District Committee of the House by unanimous vote, but died on the calendar in the closing hours of the session.

So far as I know there is not the slightest opposition anywhere to the changes in this charter sought by the association.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, if there are no further remarks or questions to be asked, I move the previous question on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOCHT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGULATING THE ISSUANCE OF CHECKS, DRAFTS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 1033, an act regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person within the District of Columbia who, with intent to defraud, shall make, draw, utter, or deliver any check, draft, or order for the payment of money upon any bank or other depository, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivering that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository for the payment of such check, draft, or order in full upon its presentation, shall be imprisoned for not more than one year, or be fined not more than $1,000, or both. As against the maker or drawer thereof the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering by such maker or drawer of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee because of insufficient funds of the maker or drawer in its possession or control, shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository, provided such maker or drawer shall not have paid the holder thereof, upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order, together with the amount of protest fees, if any. The word "credit," as used herein, shall be construed to mean arrangement or understanding, express or implied, with the bank or other depository for the payment of such check, draft, or order.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 1, page 1, of the bill, strike out the word "imprisoned" and insert the words "guilty of misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment."

In line 12, page 2 of the bill, strike out the words "upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order," and insert "the amount due thereon."

In line 14, page 2 of the printed bill, after the word "any," strike out the period, insert a comma and the words "within five days after receiving notice in person, or in writing, that such draft or order has not been paid."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill are in operation in, I think, nearly every State in the Union, but to my positive knowledge in the States of New York and Pennsylvania. For amplification of its provisions, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], the author of the bill.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield for a question?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will yield.

Mr. HICKS. In reading this bill, and having heard the explanation given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is similar to the laws in various States of the Union, will the gentleman state just what is the law in the District of Columbia and why we have not had this law upon the statute books before?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. As I understand the law in the District of Columbia, it is necessary to prove an intent to defraud. This bill provides that the making of the check, for the purpose of prosecution, shall be prima facie evidence of the fact that there is an intent to defraud, unless the maker or drawer of the check within five days makes good the amount appearing on the face of the check. This bill is very similar in its language to the present New York law, except that the New York law makes the drawer of the check with intent to defraud guilty of an attempt at larceny.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman state what the present law is in the District of Columbia?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have just stated that the present law makes it punishable to issue a check with an intent to defraud, and the difficulty is in proving that intent to defraud. It has been impossible under the procedure in the District to prove makers of checks guilty of an intent to defraud. This bill provides that if he does not make the check good within five days he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by fine or imprisonment.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LONDON. The law of New York gives the maker of the check 10 days, does it not?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The law of New York gives 10 days' notice.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. MANN. If I understand this bill correctly—and I desire to be corrected if I do not—under the existing law a man who gives a check when he knows that he has no money in the bank could not be prosecuted successfully without proof of the intent to defraud. The fact that he had no money in the bank is not prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud, but under this bill a man gives a check on a bank where he has no money, and if it is not paid within five days after protest and notice it is to be prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud—not conclusive evidence but prima facie evidence.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; that is it.

Mr. KING. I see that this bill provides for punishment in the penitentiary for a man who with intent to defraud issues a check upon any bank or other depository knowing that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank, and I would like to ask the gentleman if that would apply to the Sergeant at Arms' office.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I presume it would.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does this bill cover the Sergeant at Arms' office down stairs?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I presume so, but I can not answer.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the gentleman believe that 10 days is a more reasonable notice than 5 days?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Well, I have no objection to it being made 10 days.

Mr. LONDON. I think five days is too short.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Would the gentleman be in favor of a general amendment of the law in all cases of fraudulent representation as provided in this bill?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. This bill was passed by the Senate——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman did not catch my question. Under the law now the first part of the bill does not add anything. The first part of the bill is the law to-day without any statute. The real law that you are writing here appears on page 2 in line 4, and the rest of it is the law now. It is unlawful now to draw a check on a bank when you have no funds there if you do it knowingly and willfully for the purpose of defrauding. Now, I want to ask the gentleman what has been held by the courts in Maryland and the District of Columbia with reference to the effect of proof of the act. The bill does not add to the crime but it changes the rule of evidence. Suppose a defendant is indicted for obtaining from me an automobile under certain false representations. When the prosecution proves the procurement of the automobile, proves the representations upon which I turned over the automobile to the defendant, and proves that these representations were false, what is the rule then under existing law? Does it devolve on the defendant to prove that there was no intent to defraud; in other words, does the burden shift to the defendant or not?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I can not answer that except to say that there has been great difficulty in proving the intent to defraud, and there have been few successful prosecutions under the general law.

Mr. WINGO. I am in favor of prosecutions of this sort, and I appreciate the difficulties. I have been attorney for a bank and have had cases of this kind in court, and I know the difficulty that surrounds them. But is not the same difficulty encountered in every case of fraud, and do you not by this simply remove the protection of the presumption of innocence from the man who defrauds by drawing a check? You raise the presumption that he is guilty when you have proved that he has no funds in the bank, and thereby shift the burden on him to prove his innocence or rather lack of intent to defraud.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; it gives him five days to make good the amount of the check.

Mr. WINGO. That is compounding a felony and really makes the act vicious from that standpoint. Would it not be better to provide that the fact he drew a check and that he has no funds in the bank should prima facie show fraudulent intent? Why go ahead and provide that he may compound the felony by paying it off?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Is the gentleman from Arkansas familiar with the law in his own State with reference to this matter?

Mr. WINGO. Not within the past few years. They have passed a banking law down there lately, and they may have amended the statute, but I suspect that every State has a law somewhat similar to this with reference to fraudulent bank checks. Banks are highly organized. I have been a bank director and a bank attorney myself. And while I support the law, it occurs to me that whenever we undertake to have reforms along this line we ought to give the benefit to every man who is defrauded. Why should you not make a general rule of evidence in the District that where persons obtain property or funds under false representations, and the representations are proven to be false, that that shall be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud?

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, this is to meet the unusual circumstances of a man who has been carrying a bank account who may have exhausted it, and whether he gives the check fraudulently or otherwise, in order that it may not be too drastic it is provided that he may have this time. Even if he gives the check in good faith and has no money there, we do not want to put him in jail. We give him a chance to make good his checks. That was all gone over, I think, by Mr. McKee, the president of the bankers' association here.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I know what the argument is; I have made it myself; but the gentleman does not catch my question. If this is a reform in the rules of evidence, from the public standpoint—and it is from the public standpoint that you must consider this—if it is wise from the banker's standpoint—and I am not criticizing him—to provide a special rule of evidence in cases of fraud, why not make it apply to every case where goods, property, or money are obtained upon fraudulent representations, and provide, by proving the falseness of the representation, the presumption of fraudulent intent shall arise. Is it any more vicious to society to have a man perpetrate a fraud by fraudulent check on a bank than it is upon a grocer by getting his goods under false pretense?

Mr. FOCHT. We made no such provision for the same reason, I presume, that it is not incorporated in the law of the gentleman's State or in the law of my own State.

Mr. WINGO. That is the point I am getting at. Because bankers are very influential men, and I am not saying this critically of them, in every State in the Union practically they have gotten a law passed which changes the rule of evidence for their benefit in the prosecution of cases for fraud. If it is wise in their case, why should not an automobile dealer or a merchant, or a wholesaler, or anyone else, not have the same privilege and be relieved of the necessity of proving criminal intent when he is prosecuting a man who has obtained goods from him under false pretenses, simply by proving the falseness of the representations, as in this case. I know what the gentleman has in mind. Not one man in a hundred, I venture to say, keeps up with his bank account. I never do. I try to clear mine up once a month, perhaps, and see whether I have overdrawn it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The reason why there is difficulty in these cases is that every man on a jury knows that the great majority of people do not keep up with the exact state of their accounts in banks. A man comes in and says he has had an account at this bank, and he has been issuing checks heretofore and he did not intend to defraud anyone. He states that he would have made it good if he had been able to. If this is a very fine change in the rules of evidence, why not make it apply to all cases of fraud?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have no objection to the gentleman taking up that provision of the law. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this time that I may yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], who desires to address the House for a moment or two out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HANDFORD MACNIDER.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I note in the gallery one of my constituents who rendered distinguished service in the World War. He was wounded at St. Mihiel and was cited three times in general orders for extraordinary heroism in action. He wears the distinguished service cross with oak-leaf clusters, the cross of the Legion of Honor, the croix de guerre with palms, and one gold and one silver star, and the Italian war cross. He rose from the training camp at Fort Snelling to the grade of lieutenant colonel.

He took an active part in the organization of the American Legion, in which he has filled various offices, and recently at the Kansas City convention he was elected to the exalted office of national commander of the American Legion. I refer to Handford MacNider, of Mason City, Iowa. [Applause.]

REGULATING THE ISSUANCE OF CHECKS, DRAFTS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the House committee has amended the provisions of the Senate bill to provide that five days shall be given as an opportunity for the maker of the check to make the amount good.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The first inquiry propounded to the gentleman from Maryland was by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], who asked why, if all of the States of the Union have this kind of legislation, or most of them do, the District of Columbia has gone without it. I think it is fair to say that this kind of legislation is of quite recent origin in most of the States, and that the District of Columbia is not very far behind in the enactment of the legislation. I do not want it to appear that Congress has been derelict in the performance of its duty with reference to legislation for the District.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would say to the gentleman that his own State passed a similar law four years ago.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would suggest in answer to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], as to the protection of others than bankers, when you prove that a man makes an intentional statement, which is false, which is fraudulent in itself, you have proved enough to meet the burden of proof as to fraudulent intent. There are many cases in which bad checks may be given by mistake, and you do not meet the burden of proof in such a case merely by proving there was no money in the bank. When you prove that a man has made a false statement, you have met the burden of proof, and so banks and others are protected.

Mr. WINGO. I hope the other Members of the House did not get the same idea of my contention which the gentleman did, because he is wholly in error. I discussed a different proposition.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I understood the gentleman to ask why this did not apply to other cases than those of checks, and I was simply suggesting that as a reply to him.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield me some time?

Mr. FOCHT. How much time?

Mr. WINGO. As an innocent bystander I ask for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. This law does not seem materially different from most of the laws enacted in the several States of the Union which are now in force, except as to one particular, in that it differs somewhat from some of the State statutes, as it allows only five days' notice to pay the amount due upon the check and the amount that may accumulate as protest fees. Has the gentleman's committee given careful consideration in respect to the length of time?

Mr. WHEELER. There is an amendment.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say in answer to the gentleman, I am not familiar with the law of all the States, but I know most of the States allow 10 days. The State of New York allows 10 days, and I presume in the District of Columbia, covering a very small territory, it was thought that five days' notice would be ample.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the bill although I think there is reason to object to the way it is written in reference to one provision. In other words, because I give a check on a bank in which I never had any money, and know I have not, the bill says that if I pay that within five days I am relieved from prosecution.

The danger I call your attention to—or rather, the evil—is this, that instead of having a different rule of evidence reach a particular class of cases that grow out of the same generic criminal offense, you ought to have one rule of evidence. Now, if the experience of the courts has demonstrated that the burden, which is upon the State in every case to establish the guilt of the defendant beyond reasonable doubt, and the presumption of innocence that goes as a general rule in behalf of every defendant charged with crime—if the adherence to those rules in cases of fraud has defeated the ends of justice, then why not amend the rule of evidence in all fraud cases? That was the suggestion I made. If you prove, as my friend here suggested, if the State on the presentation of its case should prove what the gentleman states, that takes it out of this situation entirely.

A jury would convict under the present law in the District of Columbia if you prove what the gentleman has suggested. Here is what you want to do: You want to shift the burden of evidence. By this bill you simply say, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence which follows every defendant into the prisoner's box, notwithstanding the burden of the State to prove on the whole case that the defendant is guilty as charged beyond a reasonable doubt, you say, notwithstanding that, as a general rule, when you prove a man gave a check on the bank and it was shown that he did not have funds there, he is presumed to have acted with a fraudulent intent. Gentlemen say that if you do not do that bankers will suffer. If you do not do that, grocerymen will suffer, and my observation has been that there have been more crimes committed in connection with storekeepers than with bankers.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is there not this distinction, namely, that in the case of a merchant you go to him and get credit for the goods that you buy, but in the case of the banker you get credit for the amount of money you deposit?

Mr. WINGO. I will say that a man I know represented to a merchant that had been carrying his account for three or four years that he was still employed by a lumber company. He had been paying up each pay day. They found out afterwards that he was discharged. He knew that the conditions were changed, and he made a false representation, and he could not have gotten those goods at all except on the fact that he was a known employee of a reputable concern there next door to the merchant.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, the merchant could very easily have verified the fact before he extended credit.

Mr. WINGO. I will tell you what the defense was, namely, that he hoped to get back. And the defense is, when they have not money in the bank, that they expected to have some funds or that they made a miscalculation. The only suggestion I had to make—and it just occurred to me—was to have it reach the point where we could amend the rules of evidence in all fraud cases and not simply as to checks on banks.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has several times referred to this bill as being in the interest of the bank. Is it in the interest of the bank that takes the check? The bank does not pay the check. If a man gives a check on a bank without money in the bank, unless he is in good standing, the check is protested. The banks are secure.

Mr. WINGO. I think the gentleman's correction is well taken.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE].

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker, there is one feature of this bill that seems to me to be a joke. However, I do not mean to be understood as opposing this law, but if we enact one let us enact one that has teeth in it. I am not so fearful of jeopardizing the liberties of any individual by saying that a certain state of facts shall be prima facie evidence of guilt. In fact, so far as I know, every State, or practically every State, in the Union has enacted laws similar to this. But I have my first statute to read that says that notice must be served, either in person or in writing, upon the individual before it shall constitute a sufficient ground to assume that the act was done with a fraudulent intent.

Now, let me state a hypothetical case. Let us see where you are going to get to with this law if it is passed by Congress just as it is written. Now, it shall be prima facie evidence of guilt only if the drawer shall not have paid the holder of the check, together with the amount of protest fees, within five days after receiving notice in person or in writing. I go down to a merchant here and give him my check this morning for $200. I immediately leave for New York City. The merchant does not know where I have gone. He could not serve notice upon me in person, because I am not here. He could not serve notice on me in writing, because he does not know my address. And before you could receive the benefits of this legislation you must affirmatively show that I have received the notice provided for under the act.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman states that immediately after he gives the check he leaves for New York City. Would not that be prima facie evidence under this bill that he intended to defraud?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Why New York City more than Texas? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLOUSE. I do not quite agree with the gentleman that that would be sufficient prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud. I do know the trouble the merchants and the business men are put to by the indiscriminate drawing on accounts in banks by people, in which banks they have no funds. If we are going to enact this law, let us make notice of the fact that payment has been demanded and refused for lack of funds, sufficient if mailed to his last known address.

That is the only remedy that you can give to the business people, the only effective remedy that you can give them. If you intend to give them anything, let us give them something that is practical and possible for them to operate under.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I doubt if there is any other class of crime that is looked upon as more trivial than the giving of a worthless check, and I often wondered why it is one of the hardest crimes to prove. Now, if every merchant would do, as in some States the law provides, make a reasonable search, to be satisfied whether or not the man had money to meet that check, in most cases that would be sufficient. This law makes no provision of that kind at all. It allows the merchant to be careless, and it allows the banker to be careless in paying the check. If they were required to examine into the matter, we would not have much need for legislation of this kind.

Mr. CLOUSE. But you will recollect that in all cases it is not possible to give that character of thorough investigation to which the gentleman has referred. For instance, I go down to a store here in Washington and give a check, drawn not upon a bank in Washington but one in Baltimore. What would you do in a case of that kind?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one more minute.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. ROSE. In answer to that I would like to say that I recently heard of the case of the son of a Member of this House who desired to ship an automobile from his residence to Washington and gave a check covering the cost of transportation. They held it up and delayed the shipment of the automobile until they could find out whether the young man had funds in the bank on which the check was drawn. I will say to the gentleman that I would not accept his check unless I knew him. But I could easily ascertain if he had money or not. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee, or make the inquiry of him, if his objection would not be fully met by the language beginning on line 13 of page 2, "the amount due thereon, together with the amount of protest fees, if any, within five days after receiving notice in person or writing"? What does the gentleman expect to do—send detectives out and hunt for the fellow who is running away?

Mr. CLOUSE. No; provide that this notice, mailed to his last address, shall be considered sufficient.

Mr. FOCHT. I wanted to ask the gentleman if that would not probably meet that objection?

Mr. CLOUSE. No; my objection is that you require the holder to first make it appear that he—the drawer—has been served with notice in writing, that the notice has been given and received by him before you can get the benefit of the presumptions of this act. You must make it affirmatively appear that he has received your notice. But if you make it mailable to his last known address, then——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If you are going to prosecute him, you have to get him within the jurisdiction anyhow. What good will it do to mail it to him?

Mr. CLOUSE. Because you can get him brought from Tennessee or anywhere else if he has committed a crime.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I understand the gentleman said he did not know where he was.

Mr. CLOUSE. You have his address, but you do not find him at that address, but notice mailed to his last known address should for all intents be regarded as sufficient.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARRISH: On page 2, line 4, after the word "both," strike out the remainder of line 4 and all of lines 5 to 16, inclusive, down to and including the word "paid."

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment because I believe it is a dangerous policy to undertake, as is done in this legislation, to change the rule of evidence. I believe that the presumption of innocence ought to stay with a man through the entire case. It would be a mistake to place the burden upon the defendant in a case of this kind. It is so easy for a misunderstanding to arise; it is so easy for a mistake to be made or a man to be imposed upon in the matter of an honest overdraft. I want it distinctly understood that I have no sympathy whatever for the man who knowingly gives a fraudulent check or willfully overdraws an account, knowing that it will not be paid, or is guilty of defrauding the public. I believe that kind of a man ought to be apprehended and punished, and punished severely. But I fear that the provision of this bill which I seek to strike out, if it becomes a law, will result in working hardships and perhaps in many cases downright injustices upon innocent people who overdraw their accounts but who do not intend to commit a crime.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the amendment reported.

Mr. PARRISH. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the amendment strikes out all of that part of the bill appearing on line 4, after the word "both," down to and including the word "paid," on line 16, referring to prima facia evidence of guilt.

Mr. MANN. That would leave the law just as it is now.

Mr. PARRISH. I do not know whether the law as it now exists is that way or not. I do not know whether the paragraph relating to "credit" is in the existing law or not, but it would leave the law substantially as it is in my State.

Mr. MANN. It would leave the law as it is here, where they can not punish for giving a fraudulent check.

Mr. PARRISH. They can punish a man for giving a fraudulent check even with the changes I have suggested.

Mr. MANN. Theoretically they can, but practically they can not.

Mr. PARRISH. With the change I have suggested, it seems to me, there is ample provision for punishment here, if the law is enforced.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in behalf of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH]. I want to call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman want time? How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RAKER. Five minutes; that is all.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to call your attention to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and particularly to the case of Bailey against the State of Alabama, decided January 3, 1911, by Mr. Justice Hughes, then an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and now the Secretary of State. I think I can state in a moment the question involved.

The State of Alabama passed a law making it a misdemeanor for a man who entered into a contract to perfrom service for another and obtained money from his employer to leave the employment without performing the service. The fact that he left the employment and did not do the work was by the act made prima facie evidence that he obtained the money through fraud.

Bailey was convicted in the lower court in Alabama. He appealed his case to the supreme court, and the State supreme court upheld the verdict. The case was removed to the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that the act was unconstitutional and that the defendant was deprived of his right to be heard. The opinion of Mr. Justice Hughes fully and clearly goes into that case, which is substantially like the case under this bill. The fact that the man did not pay is prima facie evidence of his guilt, prima facie evidence that he was guilty of fraud in issuing the check, and, second, the fact that he knew he had no money on deposit. He may not have had any money, but might have thought he had it or might have put it in the next day, but this act makes the absence of money on deposit prima facie evidence that he committed fraud when he drew the check. In submitting such a case to the jury in the District of Columbia all you have to prove is that the man drew the check and that he had no money on deposit to pay it, and that is prima facie evidence that he committed a fraud when he drew the check.

The Supreme Court of the United States holds that that rule of evidence deprives a man of his constitutional right to be heard before the court, and this decision annulled the statute of Alabama and held that a man could not be thus convicted. That is the same as in this case. Clearly it violates a man's fundamental right to be heard, to prevent evidence in his own behalf, because he would have no opportunity to do it. This act makes it prima facie evidence, and the Government will rest its case on that prima facie evidence, and the man will be adjudged guilty of a fraudulent transaction at the time he issued the check or order for the money.

I want particularly to call the attention of the committee to this decision. I have read it and reread it many times during the last four months, with reference to some legislation that is now pending before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in regard to peonage and involuntary servitude.

In this case of Bailey against the State of Alabama the Supreme Court says that not only was the defendant deprived of his constitutional right but that he was subjected to involuntary servitude, against the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, and that the statute is also unconstitutional upon that ground.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman please give me the citation to that case? I should like to look at it.

Mr. RAKER. It is the case of Bailey against Alabama, decided in Two hundred and nineteenth United States, at page 219, and running to page 245.

After reading this decision, it seems to me that there never were two cases more nearly on all fours than the case now before the House and the case decided in Two hundred and nineteenth United States, at page 219. I have not the time to read it, but anyone looking at it can readily see the similarity. The same points are involved.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Did the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama affirm the conviction, and was the case then removed to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. RAKER. The Supreme Court of Alabama affirmed the conviction, and then the case was removed to the Supreme Court of the United States, with the result which I have stated.

The SPEAKER. There are some committee amendments on which the vote will first be taken. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "imprisoned" and insert in lieu thereof the words "guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the words "upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order" and insert in lieu thereof "the amount due thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "any," insert the words "within five days after receiving notice in person, or writing, that such draft, or order, has not been paid."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard on the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is in charge of the floor. The Chair supposes he will yield.

Mr. RAKER. I just want two minutes to read part of that Alabama decision.

Mr. FOCHT. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. RAKER. The act referred to, Alabama General Acts, 1907, page 636, reads as follows:

Any person who, with intent to injure or defraud his employer, enters into a contract in writing for the performance of any act of service, and thereby obtains money or other personal property from such employer, and with like intent, and without just cause, and without refunding such money, or paying for such property, refuses or fails to perform such act or service, must, on conviction, be punished by a fine in double the damage suffered by the injured party, but not more than $300, one-half of said fine to go to the county and one-half to the person injured; and any person who, with intent to injure or defraud the landlord, enters into any contract in writing for the rent of land, and thereby obtains any money or other personal property from such landlord, and with like intent, without just cause and without refunding such money, or paying for such property, refuses or fails to cultivate such land, or to comply with his contract relative thereto, must, on conviction, be punished by fine in double the damage suffered by the injured party, but not more than $300, one-half of said fine to go to the county and one-half to the party injured.

And here is the crux of it:

And the refusal or failure of any person who enters into such contract to perform such act or service or to cultivate such land, or refund such money, or pay for such property, without just cause shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to injure his employer or landlord or defraud him.

The Supreme Court said that was unconstitutional and nullified the statute of Alabama on that ground.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to move the previous question.

Mr. FOCHT. We have discussed the question fully, and it is well understood that the bill carries out the policies for which it is intended.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum here if we are going to start the steam roller. I have never made the point of no quorum, but I make the point of no quorum now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Then I withdraw my point of no quorum.

Mr. FOCHT. How much time does the gentleman from Texas want?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not want any time; I only want to ask the gentleman a question. I want to know the reason for striking out the words "upon demand in person or in writing the amount of said check, draft, or order" and inserting "the amount due thereon."

Mr. FOCHT. He may have some amount in the bank, but not enough to meet the check.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Why not make him pay the amount of the check, and what do you mean by the words "the amount due thereon"?

Mr. MANN. They do not pay checks partially.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I know that, but why strike out the words "amount of said check, draft, or order"?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The bill as it passed the Senate provides that "if it is not paid on demand," and the committee thought that was drastic and inserted the five-days' clause, and in doing that we copied the language of the New York law which I think is "the amount due thereon." It means the same thing.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I thought it might be that the committee wanted to get the interest.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Oh, no; it is simply the amount of the check.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "both," strike out the remainder of line 4 and all of lines 5 to 16, inclusive, down to and including the word "paid."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARRISH) there were 13 ayes and 47 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOCHT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CEMETERY OF THE WHITE TABERNACLE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 2108.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2108) prohibiting the interment of the body of any person in the cemetery known as the Cemetery of White's Tabernacle No. 39 of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the date of the passage of this act it shall be unlawful to inter the body of any person in the cemetery known as the Cemetery of White's Tabernacle No. 39 of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia, and situate in the District of Columbia, to wit: Part of a tract called "Chappell's Vacancy," contained within the following metes and bounds, namely: Beginning for the same at the southeast corner of the land conveyed to Frederick Bangerter by deed recorded in Liber No. 785, folio 474, of the land records of the District of Columbia, and running thence north 15¾° east, 20.44 perches; thence south 89° east, 3.9 perches; thence south 15¾° west, 20.44 perches; thence north 89° west, 3.9 perches to the point of beginning; and any person or persons violating the provisions of this act, or aiding or abetting its violation, shall be subject to a fine or not less than $100 nor more than $500 for each offense, to be collected as other fines are collected in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the board of officers of White's Tabernacle No. 39 of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia, be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered, under such regulations as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may prescribe, to disinter and remove all the bodies now buried in said cemetery lot, and to transfer and reinter the same in some other suitable cemetery or cemeteries selected by the said board of officers of White's Tabernacle No. 39 of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, and at the cost and expense of said order: Provided, That each monument, tombstone, or marker marking any grave or graves in said described burial ground shall be transferred to mark the grave or graves in which such body or bodies are to be interred, and shall be there placed in position as soon as can be done without danger of settling.

SEC. 3. That in so far as the same shall be inconsistent with the provisions of this act as to the cemetery lot herein described, sections 675 and 680 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia shall be, and the same are hereby, declared inoperative, otherwise said sections 675 and 680 to remain unqualified and in full force and effect.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, the House knows from the reading of the bill this measure provides for the removal of bodies now interred in a cemetery in the northwestern part of the city about which there is growing residential and commercial congestion. It seems desirable to remove these bodies without the District, which is to be done by this colored secret society at their expense. It is recommended that they get the authorization provided for by this bill. If there are no questions to be asked and no remarks to be made I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOCHT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PROSPECT HILL CEMETERY.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, there is an understanding with gentlemen who have other bills which they wish to bring forward and the District Committee having consumed an hour and 20 minutes I wish to yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED], who has a bill on the private calendar considered by the District Committee, which corresponds somewhat to the bill just passed.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 7601 be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 7601 be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7601) to amend an act incorporating Prospect Hill Cemetery, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That wherever the words "members of the German Evangelical Society" occur in the original act of incorporation entitled "An act to incorporate the proprietors of Prospect Hill Cemetery," approved June 13, 1860 (12 Stats., p. 32), they shall be interpreted and construed to mean and shall signify the proprietors of lots in said cemetery.

That the affairs, business, and property of said corporation shall be under the direction, control, and management of a board of seven trustees, any five of whom shall constitute a quorum with full authority to act, which board of trustees shall be elected annually by the proprietors of lots in said cemetery, and the trustees shall elect and appoint from their own board a president, a secretary, and a treasurer; also appoint all necessary officers and agents and fix their duties and compensation, and make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they may deem proper for conducting the affairs of the corporation for the government of lot holders and visitors to the cemetery. The board of trustees shall have authority to fill temporary vacancies occurring in their board and shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified.

SEC. 2. That the annual meeting of the proprietors of lots shall be held in the District of Columbia the second Tuesday of March of each and every year, the place and hour of assembling to be specified in a public notice previously given by the board of trustees, and at such meeting there shall be at least 15 lot proprietors in order to constitute a quorum to transact business. In the election of the trustees at such meeting each lot proprietor shall be entitled to one vote. Said corporation is authorized and empowered to sell any part of said cemetery grounds not used for burial purposes, and particularly that land situate west of North Capitol Street, and invest the proceeds thereof for the care, maintenance, and improvement of said cemetery, and without the purchaser being required to see to the application of the purchase money.

SEC. 3. That the said act of Congress approved June 13, 1860 (12 Stats., p. 32), and the subsequent acts of Congress approved August 5, 1890 (26 Stats., p. 299), and February 28, 1907 (34 Stats., pp. 1008–1009), so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby amended so as to authorize and empower the sale of the land hereinbefore provided.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there should be no objection to the passage of this bill, as it relates to the development and improvement of the city of Washington. The bill has been approved by the Commissioners of the District. It has twice been unanimously favorably recommended by the District of Columbia Committee. Owing to the vast amount of legislation pending in the Sixty-sixth Congress it was not reached before the close of the session.

The bill relates to a burial ground in the heart of the city. The extension of North Capitol Street many years ago cut off a part of Prospect Hill Cemetery from the main cemetery proper, and the parcel of land so cut off has been abandoned as a place of sepulture. There is no one to care for it or keep it clean, and the regulations of the city are such that it can not be used for burial purposes. Under the provisions of this bill this land may be sold and used for building purposes, and will be a revenue producing property for the District. In a short time the city will probably be getting three or four thousand dollars a year in taxes from this old cemetery ground that is now practically useless. In the main cemetery more than a hundred veterans of the Civil War have been interred. The proceeds will be used to beautify and keep up the main cemetery. This is specially made a condition of the sale authorized by the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. How large an area is there in this cemetery?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I could not tell the gentleman the exact area. I have here a map of the city of Washington which will show its size as compared with several blocks of city lots.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I am surprised that the gentleman has not given closer study to that.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I may say that it is one of the smaller cemeteries of the city.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. REED of West Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any further business?

Mr. FOCHT. Nothing further to-day, Mr. Speaker.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field service.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8928, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] had demanded tellers upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. Pending the demand for tellers being seconded, the committee rose. Does the gentleman from New Jersey now demand tellers?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, pending the demand for tellers I ask unanimous consent, in view of the fact that the amendment was pending and the vote being taken during the last session of Congress, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] be accorded five minutes in which to explain the amendment, and that I be accorded five minutes in which to reply, and that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 3, line 12, after the word "shall," add the following: "under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that pending the demand for tellers he may be permitted to discuss the amendment for five minutes, and that the gentleman from Indiana may be permitted to discuss the amendment for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment now under consideration was presented as one of a number of amendments that had preceded it, and the purpose of the amendment is to provide that the heads of the various departments, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, shall allocate these positions instead of that being done as provided for in the text of the bill. I take it that if we were conducting this Government as a private business, or as a business corporation, we would charge the heads of the various departments with the responsibility of allocating the workmen in the several departments so as to produce the best possible results. If the heads of these departments are worth anything, they certainly should be charged not only with the responsibility of allocating but they should have the intelligence and information by reason of their experience and observation so that they may make that allocation for the best interests of the Government, getting the best results for the amount of pay involved. This amendment provides that this responsibility shall not be taken away from the executive and placed where there is no responsibility. It should remain in the executive, and should be exercised under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. I can not, for the life of me, see why there should be any objection to the amendment. It is in the interest of good government and for the best interests of the Treasury of the United States. I think it should prevail.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the bill as drawn provides that the allocation shall be made by the heads of the departments, which shall be subject to review by the Bureau of the Budget, which is the agent of the Government responsible for the classification. This amendment under consideration provides that the President shall prescribe rules and regulations, and is a part of a scheme which the gentleman from Indiana intends to develop by further amendments which will substitute for the control of these expenditures, as represented by allocations from the Budget Bureau, the Bureau of Efficiency. The reason for that proposition is claimed to be that the Bureau of Efficiency has a mass of information and has recently made a compilation of the civil-service positions within the District, and that it would be uneconomical to waste the vast amount of labor which it has performed in preparing itself for this purpose. The committee reporting the bill is aware of the fact that both the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency have information and have done work which will be very helpful in lightening not only the work of allocation by the department heads but the work of review and revision by the Bureau of the Budget. Their cooperation will remove from the Bureau of the Budget a good deal of routine labor and reserve the functions of the bureau largely for the determination of vital questions. At the proper time, looking to that end, amendments will be offered by the committee. This proposition invests the President with power to make rules and regulations and means merely that subsequently this duty will be designated by the President to the Bureau of Efficiency, and we will have the Bureau of Efficiency supplanting the Bureau of the Budget in being the restraining agency to guard against extravagance and wrongful allocations being made under the classification.

The committee was strongly of the opinion that of all the agencies of the Government the restraining hands should be those of the Bureau of the Budget, which in the last analysis is responsible to the President and responsible to the Congress for the expenditures of these moneys involved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get a little information if I can. This section provides that the Bureau of the Budget shall go over these allocations. I suppose that means the places the positions are put in. Another provision of the bill provides that the Bureau of the Budget before the next session of the Congress shall make a report as to all the officers of the United States outside of the District of Columbia, this bill providing that the Bureau of the Budget shall make its report on the budget in accordance with the allocation in different departments provided by this bill. Am I correct? I have a very high idea of the Director of the Budget and the men under him. I do not know much about the men under him, but I think Gen. Dawes is one of the greatest business men I ever met.

But does anyone, does my friend from New Jersey believe that it will be possible for the Director of the Budget to allocate or determine whether allocations are correct or not as to all of the officers and employees in the District of Columbia and all of the Government employees outside of the District of Columbia between next June and next December? We have been working away on this thing for quite a number of years, fairly familiar with it before we started. We had a committee on classification, or whatever it was called, which made an elaborate report to the Congress. We have had a Bureau of Efficiency monkeying back and forth about these things for a good many years, and now we have a new bureau in the Government, and you propose to have them do overnight something that the whole Government machinery has not been able to do in years. How in the world are you going to do it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; that is what I am here for, to yield for information.

Mr. LEHLBACH. In the first place, the administrative department of the Government has not done this because it has not been vested with authority to do it, and as to the physical labor involved it will resolve itself into the bureau heads or officials of the Bureau of the Budget determining upon doubtful cases where whole classes of positions are involved. The great mass of allocations will be made by the department heads, and if the amendments are agreed to which the committee intend shortly to offer, they will have their active assistants and the detail work will be taken from their shoulders by both the Bureau of Efficiency and the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I do not know what amendments the gentleman proposes to offer that remove or change the terms of the bill. I am not familiar with those. I have taken the liberty of reading the bill. I do not believe it is possible. I think the time for the report as to the officers outside the District of Columbia at least ought not to be made fast. If this work is done it ought to be done properly, it ought to be done carefully, it ought to be done so it will remain, and not done at a guess or haphazard. The Bureau of the Budget has to make up the budget for the next year. It is a big job for the bureau. It has to go over the expenditures during the present year and the demands for the next, and that is a big job.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MANN. Not just now. I have no objection to the Bureau of the Budget having jurisdiction over these allocations in the District of Columbia, but I do not see, and I would like to get any information on the subject, how, in addition to all that, they can classify all the places of the Government employees outside the District of Columbia and report to Congress and make up the budget in accordance with it by next December.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will yield. When the Bureau of the Budget makes up its forthcoming budget and allocations, in accordance with this or any other classification to be made by the department heads, naturally in making up various items for various departments they scrutinize the allocations and the grades and classes of employees and salaries they are to receive. And that is exactly what they would be doing; they receive and revise the allocations and the two jobs are completely dovetailed into each other, because one is supplementary to the work of the other.

Now, so far as the allocations in the field are concerned——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Now, the actual work of the classification in the field will be done by the departments, under the direction of the department heads. They will get the rough work completed. They will have at their disposal such information, and I understand it is voluminous, as the Bureau of Efficiency has at its disposal, so far as the character of the job is concerned and qualifications for it; they have the job specifications of the Civil Service Commission, which initially selects people and prescribes the qualifications necessary to fill these jobs in the beginning, and again, the physical labor involved in the Bureau of the Budget will be in large part performed by other people who are equipped for that work. Whether they can take that work, revise it, and coordinate it by the time the next budget is to be transmitted to Congress, is a question of judgment, and if those in whose judgment and experience I have great faith think the time is too short, it is a simple matter to eliminate that time limitation for report on field services. But I do think it would be a mistake to leave the responsible approval to any other Government agency than the Government agency that is responsible for the money to be spent, namely, the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, although I do not want to see the Bureau of the Budget diverted from its purposes nor built up into a large force of employees, apart entirely from budget work, or a large temporary force. I believe the Bureau of the Budget may do some good. Of course, I have never had a great deal of faith in the budget system, but I am willing to be convinced and shown at any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the gentleman is acquainted with the budget law, which provides, I believe, for only four officers to perform the work in conjunction with the forces of the various department heads?

Mr. MANN. I would not say I was acquainted with any law that provided for only four or five officers in it. I am not.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations last week, namely, that there were only, outside of the head of the bureau, four or five officers provided in that law.

Mr. MANN. Apart from assignment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Apart from assignment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is my understanding of what would happen, or what is contemplated by the committee, under this bill, touching the matter of placing the personnel of the Government service in the new classified status under the act. If this bill passes the House and Senate, which I earnestly hope it will, in such form as the two bodies may eventually agree upon, at a reasonably early date, the department heads and the heads of the independent establishments can and should begin at once the placing of their employees on the classified lists, making the original allocation of the employees under the classification provided for in the law. They could present that allocation or allotment to the Bureau of the Budget, or any other bureau that may be designated to finally pass upon the matter, at any time after they have made their original allocation. They probably would present the matter to the Bureau of the Budget in the summer or early in the fall, before the regular presentation of the estimates, which, I believe, is the 1st of October. If, however, they should not present these matters to the Bureau of the Budget until the 1st of October, that bureau would have two months in which to make its allocation. I assume the committee had in mind, in providing that the Bureau of the Budget should make the final allocation, that the bureau would, under the direction of the President, secure its personnel for that service from among those employees of Government services qualified to do that class of work, principally, I should say, from the Bureau of Efficiency. I understand that the chairman of the committee now contemplates offering an amendment to the bill under which that shall be specifically provided for, that the necessary help and assistance shall be loaned by the Bureau of Efficiency and the Civil Service Commission, still leaving, however, in the hands of the Bureau of the Budget the responsibility for the work as finally done.

Now, whether or no that work of allocation or reallocation will be a difficult one will depend a good deal upon the work as it is primarily done by the bureau and department heads. If we were quite confident that all of them would use good judgment in the placing of the personnel of their departments in the classifications provided, then there would be very little for the final allocating agency to do. But inasmuch as there would be a difference of opinion, and, in some cases, the original allocation might be quite liberal toward the employee, in other cases less liberal, it is, of course, essential that some one shall survey the entire field and endeavor to make an equitable adjustment under the classification throughout the entire Government service.

Assuming for the sake of argument that the Bureau of the Budget would not receive the reports from the departments until the 1st of October, when they must be presented under the law as a part of the estimates, assuming they were not presented until then, this bureau would have two full months within which to review the work. With such allotment of personnel as might be made from the Bureau of Efficiency and the Civil Service Commission, they ought to be fully able to complete the labor of finally allocating and placing the personnel in the classified lists in a fair and equitable way before Congress meets in December. The probability is that they could get to work on some of those lists much earlier. There is no reason why they should not be able to do so. That is a matter of administration which I am sure would be given attention by the President. So that, it seems to me, the plan proposed is one that is calculated to give the departments plenty of time to bring about the adjustment of this matter in a sane and sensible and equitable way. Why, some folks have suggested that the Committee on Appropriations could within a month or two go over the whole list and classify it. Of course, members of the committee know that that could not be done.

But here is a plan under which there will be several months for the primary placing of the personnel. Then there will be at least two months for the Bureau of the Budget, cooperating with the Bureau of Efficiency and the Civil Service Commission, to make the final allocations provided for.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the gentleman's large legislative experience and also his administrative acquaintance with departmental work, does the gentleman think that where the Bureau of the Budget is charged with the responsibility of passing upon estimates involving billions of dollars, covering the transactions of every activity of the Government, it is humanly possible or feasible and practicable to impose upon the bureau this little piecemeal work of determining what shall be the proper salary and allocation of salaries to thousands and tens of thousands of the various officials and employees in the departments and in the field in two months?

Mr. MONDELL. I would be perfectly willing to give the gentleman from Wisconsin the job and think he could do it within 30 days.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would positively decline to assume to do it within that time limit.

Mr. MONDELL. With sufficient help. Of course, he would not do it all himself, but he would do a large part of it. I am suggesting that as the extreme situation. The probability is there would be more time; there is no reason why there should not be three or four months for the final allocation. That is to say, we are proposing to pass the bill now, so that there shall be all next summer and fall during which period the departments may adjust these salaries and make the final allocations.

Why do we refer the matter finally to the Bureau of the Budget? Because the Bureau of the Budget is the organization under the Government responsible for the estimates, and they can not pass upon estimates intelligently, they can not adjust estimates as they should do, unless they shall have some authority in the matter of the allocation of the classified employees. The responsibility is theirs, but the detailed work would be performed by those from the Bureau of Efficiency and the Civil Service Commission who might be delegated to do that work by the President. Under this bill the plan is a sound, sane, sensible, and logical one. We are giving an entire year for the performance of this work, and we are placing the responsibility on the agency that is responsible for the estimates.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimouse consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, there is another section in the bill which I think illustrates the wisdom of making the Bureau of the Budget the final authority to review, revise, and approve the allocations to positions.

There are two classes of employees in the service: Those that labor in connection with clerical work and other departmental work, and, second, those known as the skilled trades, such as mechanics in the navy yards, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and in the Government Printing Office. As to the latter class of employees the bill does not undertake to fix the compensation on the annual basis. Section 8 provides that the compensation of employees in the skilled trades shall be fixed by a wage commission composed of three members, to be appointed by the President, one of whom shall be a representative of the employees.

Your committee thought that there should be some final approval of the decision of the wage commission in order that there might be some uniformity in its findings. Therefore we thought it wise to lodge that authority with the Bureau of the Budget. Suppose we should change this section 3 and provide that the Bureau of Efficiency shall allocate these positions. Are we going to change section 8 and provide that the Bureau of Efficiency shall pass upon the decision of the wage commission? I dare say not.

Mr. WOOD of In. .ana. I will say to the gentleman that in order that I may be consistent and in order that he may be consistent in his argument, I propose to strike out section 8.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman would do a very unwise thing if he should offer an amendment to that effect, and that Congress would do a still more unwise thing if it should adopt the amendment.

Now, I understand organized labor opposes that the Bureau of the Budget should have anything to do with the decision of the wage board. But if we do strike out section 8 we shall have the same inequalities growing up in the service in the future as have grown up in the past. The only way we can have uniformity is to have some agency like the Bureau of the Budget as the central, definite approving authority.

What the committee has done in this bill is to provide that in one case the heads of departments shall make the allocations of these employees, and then in the other case, as to the skilled trades, the wage commission shall fix the rates of wages, but that in both cases they shall be referred to the same central authority for review, revision, and final approval, to wit, the Bureau of the Budget; and I can not think of any more logical, any more appropriate agency to have this work than the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I renew my demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 3, line 12, after the word "shall" add the following, "under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. LEHLBACH and Mr. WOOD of Indiana to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] will pass between the tellers and be counted.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 5, noes 35.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 3, line 16, after the word "herein," insert: "In making such allocation the heads of departments shall consult with the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency, and shall avail themselves of all pertinent information in the possession of both bodies."

Page 3, line 19, after the word "bureau," insert: "The Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency shall render the Bureau of the Budget such cooperation and assistance as the Bureau of the Budget may require for the performance of its duties under this act."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. From my acquaintance with the work of the Civil Service Commission I think that body could aid only very slightly in the work that will be required to be done in passing in review upon the recommendatons of the heads of the departments as to the salaries that should be paid to the respective bureau chiefs, officials, and employees of the departments. The Civil Service Commission have hardly any technical knowledge of a character to qualify them for the performance of that duty. That is a bureau organized for examination purposes, not a bureau that passes directly upon the character of the work that is being performed, except so far as the standards of efficiency and qualifications that may be required for different kinds of work is concerned are furnished by the departments. There is in the Government a highly organized bureau for which we appropriate considerable money, which has been engaged for years and years in the performance of this very work. That is the Bureau of Efficiency. It had occasion some years back to investigate the salaries and the grades of efficiency of the different employees in the Post Office Department under Postmaster General Burleson, to whom credit must be given for inviting the Bureau of Efficiency to survey his department. He saw that there was need of having salaries and wages based largely upon the compensation paid outside the Government service for work of the same character. The Bureau of Efficiency made extended investigation of the salaries paid by railroads to employees in clerical positions, and of the salaries paid to clerks and others in large commercial and industrial establishments, for the purpose of arriving at a standard which should be the basis of pay for those in the departments here. Now, the Bureau of Efficiency has that data. It made a full review of all that work. The Civil Service Commission is organized largely for examination purposes, and has not a knowledge as to the wages and salaries which should be paid. This is a bill seeking to determine what is a proper wage and salary scale to be paid to Government employees and officials, and the Bureau of Efficiency has that information. Then why should we include the Civil Service Commission as an aid in that work?

Mr. Chairman, I move as an amendment to strike out the words "the Civil Service Commission" in both paragraphs of the amendment, so as to leave the detail work entirely with the Bureau of Efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the amendments offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Strike out the words "Civil Service Commission" wherever they appear in both amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee rose, and was recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield for the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I did not hear all that the gentleman from Wisconsin said in support of his amendment. I am sure we are all anxious to make the very best provision that can be made for the wise and sound and equitable allocation of the personnel on the classified lists. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin of the opinion that the Civil Service Commission can not render useful service in this regard?

Mr. STAFFORD. We have in existence an agency that is fully equipped in every particular with this information. That is the Bureau of Efficiency. I take it that the Civil Service Commission will have to create an additional branch of its service in order to be able to aid the Bureau of the Budget in the performance of their work in determining the proper salaries that should be paid to the various heads of departments and other employees.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, this entire matter will be handled by the President primarily. The Bureau of the Budget is the President's direct official organization. It will be for the President, following the recommendations of the chief of the Bureau of the Budget, to determine to what extent the Civil Service or other services may contribute to the success of this work. Of course, this can all be done without this specific authority.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take issue with the gentleman from Wyoming when he suggests that if we adopt this amendment vesting authority in the Civil Service Commission to collaborate with the Bureau of the Budget that activity will be under the control of the President, so far as the Civil Service Commission work is concerned. We are legislating to vest this authority in two bureaus, or in one bureau primarily, to have the aid of two agencies of the Government, one the Civil Service Commission and the other the Bureau of Efficiency.

I contend very strongly that the Civil Service Commission today has no data, is not equipped to aid in the particular design that is to determine what should be the proper salaries to be paid and the proper allocation in these positions.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, is not the Civil Service Commission, and will it not be for months to come, absolutely incapable of rendering any service in view of the President's order respecting postmasters?

Mr. STAFFORD. Be that as it may, if we vest it in the Civil Service Commission it will be necessary for that commission to establish an additional agency, a duplicate of this Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin is an old and tried legislator and he knows perfectly well that under this language the Director of the Bureau of the Budget could call on the Civil Service Commission for a single employee, if he called upon them at all, or he could call for half a dozen or a hundred.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take issue with the gentleman. The fact is, if the gentleman knows anything of the functions of the Civil Service Commission, that they have no evidence in their possession, they have no agency under their existing establishments, which can be any aid to determining the proper salaries to be paid to the various employees and officials of the Government.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. ROACH. I want to suggest to the gentleman that he should incorporate in his amendment the striking out of the word "both," because it says that there shall be a call made on both of these departments. I want to suggest also that if they do not display any better judgment as a consulting agency than they do in applying practical methods to the post-office examinations of this country they will not be of much value to the Budget Bureau in making these salary allocations.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thank the gentleman for his valuable contribution.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did I undertsand the gentleman to say that the Civil Service Commission would have to have some new officials in order to determine the facts about these salaries?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what I said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think we all realize that there is need for a reclassification. We all know that a great many salaries now being paid by the Government are too small for the character of the service rendered, and I think it can be truly said that there are some that are too high for the services rendered to the Government. There is an inequality in salaries among the departments here that ought to be corrected. Several years ago it was my privilege to present an appropriation bill which carried for the first time a provision looking to a reclassification. But I very much doubt, gentlemen, that this is the particular time to enter on a reclassification of salaries, especially when we are told that the passage of this bill as reported means an increase of more than $9,000,000 to the salary roll in the District of Columbia alone. That, in addition to the $35,000,000 or $50,000,000 paid in the last two years by the way of bonus to employees in order to take care of the high cost of living.

The gentleman from New Jersey, the chairman of the committee, placed in the RECORD the other day a statement showing that he was going to offer an amendment which would reduce the salaries proposed in the reclassification bill. Gentlemen, that has only served to emphasize the doubt in my mind that Congress ought to pass this bill at this time. It shows, with all due respect to the committee, that there has not been given that full and thorough consideration to the salaries which are being proposed in the reclassification bill that ought to have been given. Who is there here, whether he be on the committee or not, that can tell any Member of this Congress just what this reclassification bill is going to mean in dollars and cents to the Treasury of the United States? They say that it will cost more than $9,000,000, but I tell you that there has been no statement furnished to Congress which gives absolute and definite information as to just what this bill means in the way of increasing the salary roll in the District of Columbia.

Now, I know, of course, that some sort of effort has been made to secure this information. I have been told that this information was gathered in this way. In other words, the committee fixed the maximum and minimum salaries under the classification schedule and then they sent them to a bureau chief, or the head of the department and through him to the bureau chief, and asked him to say just what it would mean in point of money as applied to his particular bureau. No reliance can be placed on information like that, gathered as it was from many individuals, each of whom was free to place his own construction on the proposed law.

I submit, gentlemen, that there ought to be a little more systematic effort to get exact and definite information before we are called upon to vote for this bill. As the gentleman from Wisconsin well said a while ago, the Bureau of Efficiency has been making examinations and gathering information along this line for the past 10 years. It has valuable information which it has gathered at public expense, information gathered from all of these departments which will justify a reclassification of salaries in these departments without additional work or investigation. It has established efficiency ratings in the Post Office Department and the State Department and in a number of bureaus in the Treasury Department. Are you going to cast that aside and not use that information in the effort to properly classify and equalize salaries in the District of Columbia and put them on a fair basis, doing justice to both the employee and the Government?

I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], if I understand it correctly, ought to be adopted. There are several features of this bill that I do not favor. I do not like section 8, providing for a wage commission, but that will be discussed later.

There is another objection that I have to this particular bill. I do not know whether anybody here agrees with me or not on the subject, but I do not agree with my distinguished friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who thinks that the Bureau of the Budget ought to be charged with the final supervision of these allocations and this classification. I feel sure that we all want to see the Bureau of the Budget function just as the law intended it should function, and I say that you are endangering the proper functioning of that bureau if you now undertake to put upon it this extra duty which was never contemplated when the law was passed or when the director was appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not speak for the present director, because I have no right to speak for him—I have not discussed the matter with him—but I dare say that if any of you gentlemen would talk to Gen. Dawes, the very efficient and earnest Director of the Bureau of the Budget, he would tell you that this duty should not be placed upon that bureau, because it now has all that it can possibly do. What does the law contemplate with reference to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget? The law specifically provided that the director should be appointed by the President. His term is indefinite. He may be continued during the entire term of the President or he may be removed and some one else appointed at any time. It is not necessary for him to be confirmed by the Senate. In other words, the whole idea of the budget law was that the President of the United States should have as a director of the budget and as his adviser a man who not only holds his political views but who is his personal friend, a man who is interested in him and in whom he has the utmost confidence. I have very high respect for the present Director of the Budget, and I am not now speaking particularly of him, but of any director who might be appointed under Presidents hereafter to be elected, but I can not favor a proposition to put on that semipolitical agency of the President of the United States the duty of classifying and allocating these various positions in the District of Columbia. When you come to reclassify these positions it ought to be done free of politics. There ought not to be the slightest possibility of any suspicion of any political influence being exerted here or there in favor of any class of employees in the District. By this bill you are undertaking to fasten on the Bureau of the Budget, which as I have said is, as a matter of fact, political to a certain extent, because the appointment of the director is a political appointment, the duty of classifying these various positions here in the District of Columbia, and to that extent you will hamper him in the performance of his real duties in bringing about economy and efficiency in government.

I doubt if this is now the time to pass a reclassification bill. I am not so sure but what the bonus ought to be continued until prices are more stabilized. Farm products are lower than they have been and ought to be, wages are being reduced upon the railroads and in the factories and upon the farms and everywhere throughout the country, but here you are passing a bill at this stage of falling prices and a hoped-for reduction in the cost of living undertaking to fix irrevocably upon the statute books a provision of law which will confessedly increase the salaries paid in the District of Columbia to Government employees not only over the statutory salaries fixed by law, but, in addition to that, over the $240 extra, paid in the form of a bonus, and allowed during the past few years to take care of the increased cost of living. [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The creation of the budget was for the purpose of consolidating the various departments of the Government. This amendment, if I understand it, means there must be three separate departments passing upon one single question. Under this amendment the heads of departments must consult with the other two departments, and it necessarily follows that these departments, in order to have information, must create bureaus or departments within themselves in order to get the information about which it is to be consulted. This amendment, if adopted, means that three different agencies of the Government shall investigate the salaries paid to employees of the Government.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is the gentleman aware whether the Civil Service Commission when it advertises for an examination appends the amount of the salary which belongs to the place to fill which the examination is held?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; and that is fixed by the various departments under which the employment is sought.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. In other words, the Civil Service Commission knows and has on file the salary rate of every employee of the Government and the position for which the examination is held?

Mr. DOWELL. As it is at the time of the examination. They have that information which everyone has, if he will but look at the record. They have no more information than any individual may have if he will look at the records and see what certain employees are paid under the schedule at the time the examination is held. What I call attention to is this: The budget system was created for the purpose of consolidating these various departments. I differ with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

I believe it is the duty of these departments to have an itemized account of what is to be expended. The Bureau of the Budget is the one department of all others that should have the necessary information to be sent to the Congress, but when two other separate bureaus of the Government must be consulted it necessarily follows that we must equip these two other bureaus with the same equipment given to the Bureau of the Budget in order to secure the information, or their advice would be of no value, and we are therefore multiplying the expenditure of carrying out this provision.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the amendment which is under consideration require that the Bureau of the Budget shall consult these other departments?

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand the amendment, it is mandatory.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, the gentleman is utterly mistaken about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 16, after the word "herein," insert:
"In making such allocations the heads of departments shall consult with the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency, and shall avail themselves of all pertinent information in the possession of both bodies."

"The Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency shall render the Bureau of the Budget such cooperation and assistance as the Bureau of the Budget may require for the performance of its duties under this act."

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; and the amendment provides that the heads of the departments shall consult with the Civil Service Commission.

Why will the Civil Service Commission be consulted unless you furnish the commission with an agency that will give the information you want to secure? That will happen after this amendment carries, for we will be called upon to provide a department within this department to furnish the information sought.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. I ask permission to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana because I believe this question should be left with the budget.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any objection to that part of the amendment which authorizes the Bureau of the Budget to get the assistance of the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency, if the Bureau of the Budget desires it?

Mr. DOWELL. No. If you will strike out of this amendment the word "shall" and then permit the consultation, if they desire it, I would have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Then the objection is not in reference to the heads of the department——

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Permitting them to consult?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes. I have no objection to that, but to require them in my judgment means we must furnish that department with special equipment to secure the information.

Mr. MANN. It might at least very much delay the action by the heads of the department.

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly it would delay, and I think this amendment as it now stands should be voted down. I have no objection to the head of a department consulting with the Civil Service Commission. They should consult with every department official where information can be secured, but it does not require an amendment here to permit them to make this investigation and consult with other departments with reference to information, and when you require it as a matter of law it necessarily follows you must equip that department with the necessary means to secure the information desired.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I will.

Mr. BEGG. Is it really necessary to have legislation to permit the Bureau of the Budget to get this information now?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly not. They may secure any information from any department of the Government, and it is not necessary to pass this amendment. It seems to me we are only delaying and encumbering this matter, and it can not be worked out properly unless we leave the responsibility where it is.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the details of the amendment which is pending, and therefore I am not competent to speak as to the advisability of the adoption or rejection of that amendment, but I have long since believed that the time has come for a simplification of the practice prevailing in fixing compensation for those who are employed by the Government. The compensation should be uniform for like work. The enactment of a classification law, it seems to me, is one of paramount importance. The Committee on Appropriations has no power and will not undertake to exercise power, as I understand it, and at any rate, as far as I am concerned, to increase compensation beyond the statutory salaries. And it is therefore more important than ever before that there should be some authority vested somewhere to place before the Committee on Appropriations a concise authorized compensation to be paid by the Government for the various classes of employment.

I think what we should do is to work along orderly lines. Now, whether the budget officer is the man best qualified to fix compensation under the efficiency ratings or not I do not undertake to say, but what I do undertake to say is that it is vitally important that some law should be enacted fixing and esablishing the power in some one to do that very thing, so when the question comes before the Committee on Appropriations it will not be called upon to equivocate or vacillate or violate the laws or the rules of the House. I am firmly of the opinion that it should be the business of the Committee on Appropriations to write the bills under the law as we find it and not to inject itself into the creation of new laws. Now, that being the case, the question before you gentlemen here is to determine whether or not in the face of the present situation there should be a classification law that will enable us as your representatives on the Committee on Appropriations to function with some degree of intelligence. The budget officer has more facilities that can be utilized in the fixing of compensation on ratings fixed, either by the Efficiency Bureau or by the heads of the bureaus or departments, than any other institution in the Government, and it might be very wise to place the responsibility on him to write into the estimates for any given year just what the ratings should be as set out by either the Bureau of Efficiency or the bureau heads or chiefs or heads of departments.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Must not he necessarily know what is paid to each one in order to recommend that?

Mr. MADDEN. He should; somebody should; but the main thing and the most important thing here, as I see it, is that there should be some law enacted which will place the responsibility somewhere. You can not place it on the Committee on Appropriations; that would be endless detail, and you do not want the Committee on Appropriations to assume that responsibility. They ought not to assume it. They ought to be permitted to write the figures fixed by the law and say whether or not these figures shall obtain, or whether there should be a certain number of people in a department or whether you are going to increase or decrease the amount to be expended in a given year. But they ought not to be called upon to say what the rate of pay shall be. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with what the gentleman from Illinois has just said, but I want to discuss for a moment the pending amendment.

I believe the amendment should be adopted. I think it will decidedly improve the bill from the Government's standpoint. Now, the method of allocating, as provided in the bill, is for it to be done, in the first instance, by the heads of departments, and then later on reviewed, revised, and approved by the Bureau of the Budget. The committee thinks it is very important that this work should be done, in the first instance, just as uniformly as possible. The committee knows that if we left this allocation to the heads of the departments or the bureau chiefs unassisted and gave them the same power of decision as they now have, we would have approximately the same amount of inequality and lack of uniformity that we now have.

Concerning present inequalities, what did the Commission on Reclassification find in studying this whole situation? It found, for instance, that in some of these new departments, as compared with some of the older ones, an inequality existed like this. On page 38 the commission says:

> The average salary for junior mail-route clerks, for example, was $878 in the old establishments not expanded by the war, as contrasted with $1,116 in the war-expanded organizations other than the Treasury.

So far as I know, the nature of the duties performed in each case is the same.

If you will analyze the rolls of the new departments, like the War Risk Insurance Bureau, you will find a very much higher range of salary for identically the same class of employment than exists in the older departments. The purpose of this amendment is to require all of these heads of departments to call upon the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency for help in making this classification. The committee believes that requirement would materially aid uniformity and system, and certainly that is a consummation devoutly to be wished.

Now, when the allocation goes up to the Bureau of the Budget, the director does not have to call upon the Civil Service Commission or the Bureau of Efficiency for assistance, but the amendment which the gentleman from New Jersey has offered gives him the power to do it, and I think that also is desirable. And, therefore, I think the amendment should be adopted as it now reads.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to state a case?

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to.

Mr. MANN. Take it in the custodian service of public buildings, where they have a post office in the building, the custodian service of the building is under the Treasury Department. The janitor, I believe, gets paid about $60 a month. The Post Office Department has janitors in the Post Office Department under the Post Office. They get paid about $100 a month. Now, under the provision that is offered there would be the intention to somewhat bring those salaries under the same lines for the same work.

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Whereas if it was simply left to the head of the department it might be made exactly as it is now, with two men working side by side doing the same work but paid very different salaries because they were under different departments.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman is exactly right. That is what would happen in many cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question in connection with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will be glad to yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. But the last clause of this paragraph provides that this entire matter should be determined by the Bureau of the Budget, and that is where you have your equalization. It is not presumed now that you are going to get this except through this agency.

Mr. BLACK. The thought the committee has in mind is identically the thought suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. If we allow the bureau heads to make the original allocation without any supervision, we will have an allocation go up to the Director of the Budget which would in all probability lack uniformity, and the more unequal it is the more likely the Bureau of the Budget would be to make errors in its revision and in its final approval. And so it occurs to me that the sensible thing to do is to have the allocations made as uniform and as equal in the original instance as possible, and then the Director of the Budget will be less liable to make errors in his revision and in his final approval. I think the amendment speaks for itself and really needs no defense.

Mr. DOWELL. The fact that the last paragraph is in this section indicates to the committee that the committee well knows that the department will not do this work except through the work of the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. BLACK. I just explained my viewpoint upon that. I think it is very wise and very salutary that the Bureau of the Budget is to do that—review, revise, and finally approve the allocations—but we want the list to go to it in as good a shape as possible in the original instance.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to some history that I think is very applicable in the consideration of the amendment now before us. The Bureau of Efficiency was created in 1912 and was made a part of the Civil Service Commission. It proved an abosolute failure, and was undermining the real purpose of the civil service. In consequence in 1916 the Efficiency Bureau was taken away from the civil service and made an independent establishment and has been doing remarkably well ever since. It is not the business of the Civil Service Commission to fix salaries. It is their purpose to examine applicants, to see whether or not they are fit to become employees of the Government, and to classify them in accord with the grades that they make. Now, then, we are going back to throwing the same poison into the Civil Service Commission that was destroying it in 1912 and down to 1916, if this amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey is adopted. In my opinion, the civil service should have no responsibility concerning the efficiency of the employees of the Government after examination and employment. It has quite enough to do in passing upon their qualifications, and when they become employees of the Government of the United States it should be the function of somebody else to determine efficiency. One of the great weaknesses of this Government is in the division of responsibility that we find all the way through it.

Now, then, suppose this amendment were adopted here. Then we would have this responsibility divided among three different agencies—the Budget Bureau, the Bureau of Efficiency, and the Civil Service Commission—each one of them denying that this or that which has proven an utter failure can be traced to them, or that they have had anything to do with that, and perhaps taking all the praise for that which proves for efficiency, whether that credit belongs to them or not. The responsibility should be lodged somewhere. It should be lodged in one agency and not divided among three.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that there is a growing need for an intelligent reclassification of the civil service of the United States. But we should have an intelligent reclassification, and the very amendments that are now being proposed to this bill are but emphasis to the fact that this is not an intelligent reclassification, and there is nobody who can undertake to interpret it in dollars and cents.

Now, then, I have called the attention of this committee to this before, and I think your attention should be called to it again, that there is an Executive order now extant and in process of being worked out whereby an efficiency survey is being taken of every department of the Government. Questionnaires are now in the hands of the different heads of the departments and the employees of those departments for the purpose of establishing efficiency ratings in these several departments.

I have heretofore called attention to the fact—and I shall call attention to it again—that we have spent more than a million dollars in investigations for the purpose of entering upon a reclassification, and we have had no benefit whatever from the result of those investigations, while, on the other hand, a reclassification has been made that applies to all the employees of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia, embracing some 65,000 people, a reclassification that is complete and only needing an Executive order to put it into effect, and until we can have an intelligent reclassification covering the whole field submitted to us, with somebody behind it who can tell us what it means, we had better go a little slow instead of driving along "sight unseen" and increasing salaries to the extent of nearly $20,000,000, covering employees inside and outside the District of Columbia.

I am desirous of a reclassification. Everybody who has had to do with this present hodge-podge of salaries should be desirous of a reclassification. But I am opposed to this reclassification, because it is not intelligent, and nobody can understand it or explain it satisfactorily, and it is being made at a time when the Government of the United States ought to be a little mindful of fixing permanent salaries when, as I stated before, the cost of living is going constantly down, for a salary once fixed by statute is never decreased.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Indiana has given a great deal of study to this subject, and, as I understand, if this amendment carries, it will impose upon the Civil Service Commission duties other than those which they now have. Am I correct in that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And it seems to me it would subject them also to political influences and other influences that would be likely to interfere with the proper performance of their duties as now imposed upon them. Does the gentleman agree with me on that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. I think the gentleman is entirely correct about that, and if the Civil Service Commission is what it should be and what it was intended to be by the framers of the law creating it, no other duties than those of grading applicants and ascertaining the qualifications of applicants will be put upon them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. CROWTHER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will bear with me for a moment, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize, of course, the extreme importance of this measure. I had the privilege and honor of being a member of the committee in the last Congress when the original report came in, accompanied by a very voluminous bill, which this bill takes the place of, and I realize that there is, perhaps, a certain necessity of adjudicating wages. I suppose the word "adjudicating" in this connection means largely the raising of wages, because nobody contemplates that anybody's wages or salary will be reduced by this bill, and I think, perhaps, that may be a very necessary and splendid thing to do for the benefit of the employees of the Government.

Personally I think that the United States should set an example as to wage standards, for we can not expect industrial concerns to pay wages that will maintain American living standards if the Government fails to set a good example.

It is true that the Government employees need all the money they can get, especially those who live in Washington, for this city is the paradise of the profiteer, where rents and living expenses are higher than they are anywhere else in the world. Speaking of salary increases, I believe that it would meet with popular approval if the congressional salaries were raised, although probably no Member has the necessary nerve to introduce a bill to do it, because we are pledged to economy, and no Member would care to shoulder the blame as to inconsistency that would follow such action. Yet Members receiving $7,500 to-day are not really getting as much as they did when the salary was $5,000 a few years ago.

But I want to say this, that there is a general impression in the country that certain promises made by this administration have not been lived up to, and one of them is a three-word promise contained in the President's inaugural address, "instant tariff action."

Mr. Chairman, my home papers carried a story last week regarding the establishment of bread lines for the deserving poor and needy, and in some of the cities of my district manufacturing plants are closed because we have no tariff bill. Let every Member on this side of the House urge upon his Senators the urgent need of speedy action on the Fordney bill. [Applause.]

Another thing demanding attention is the adjusted compensation bill for our soldiers, and while I do not intend to oppose the bill now pending I feel that every Member of this House, especially on the Republican side, ought to stop raising the wages of civilian employees of the Government until we pass the adjusted compensation bill, or the soldiers' bonus bill—I do not care what name you give it—and thus keep the party's promise to the men who went to the front and were the country's pride on the fighting line. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, in the first place, in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER], that it is not intended that as a result of the passage of this bill there shall be a general increase in salaries.

The amendment that is pending provides that in making such allocation the heads of the departments, the various bureau chiefs, the division heads who make the initial allocation, shall consult with the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency and shall avail themselves of all pertinent information in possession of both bodies.

As has been explained already, that is in the interest of initial uniformity. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] have pointed out that the Bureau of Efficiency has for years been gathering information that is invaluable in the performance of this work. It is at the present time gathering supplemental information that will be of great value in making the original allocation and in making the revision. The gentleman's bill embodies the scheme which he favors in place of this reclassification, and it seeks in a nutshell to delegate to the Bureau of Efficiency the right to write the pay rolls of the Government. Since the beginning of this Government Congress has never surrendered or delegated that right, but has held it itself, and in the bill under consideration it holds in itself the right to write the pay rolls.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman does not intend to misrepresent me. The bill that I introduced does not do what the gentleman says, but, upon the other hand, it divides the classified service into grades, leaving it with the Congress each year to fix, if it so desires, what the salary of each grade shall be.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It leaves it to the Bureau of Efficiency to recommend, to classify, and within the grades, where in some cases there is a difference of $2,000 between the maximum and the minimum, to fix whatever salaries they consider equitable and just, and leaves it to the cursory revision of the Committee on Appropriations, which can not do the work, which he himself says it will take the Bureau of the Budget months to do, and necessarily would leave the fixing of salaries to the Bureau of Efficiency instead of having a schedule of salaries adopted by Congress as the law of the land.

Why should both these bodies be consulted by the heads of the departments? The Bureau of Efficiency has this information, which is invaluable and which ought to be placed at the disposal of the department heads in making the allocation.

Now, why should the Civil Service Commission be consulted? The Civil Service Commission has analyzed and has on record in its archives a statement of the duties of every position in the civil service and the qualifications necessary to fulfill those duties. In other words, it has a job analysis of every position in the civil service of the United States. Now, why on earth can not the heads of the departments be able to go to the Civil Service Commission and say, "We are allocating these positions; give us your job analyses that you have on record"? That is all that will be required of the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission will not be asked to fix a salary. It will only be asked to give that information to the department heads, and later to the Bureau of the Budget. It would be an act of folly, because of prejudice against the Civil Service Commission or for any other reason, to deprive the Bureau of the Budget of the right to get these job analyses from the Civil Service Commission; and that will be the sum total of the contribution of the Civil Service Commission to this work, and will not vest the Civil Service Commission with one iota of authority in making the allocations.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Suppose the Director of the Budget should ascertain the fact, for instance, as to class 6 of your professional schedule that the minimum salary of $6,000 was too much for that class of service. Then what should we do?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not know of any class in which there is a minimum salary of $6,000.

Mr. CLOUSE. Under grade 6 of professional service the minimum salary is $6,000 and the maximum $7,200. That requires just such work as the district attorneys of Baltimore and New York City and other places in the country are doing for $4,500.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will read the specifications he will find that that refers to the responsible head of a big and important department. However, if the gentleman has done me the honor to read what I put into the RECORD, he will find that all these salaries have been reduced.

Mr. CLOUSE. I want to be perfectly clear on that, because I am very much interested in it. Does the gentleman mean to say that by the passage of this bill we are going to reduce the expense to the Government of the clerical help that is necessary to carry it on?

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the revision of the schedules as accepted by the committee is written into the bill there will be a reduction in the cost of the maintenance of the civil service as a result of the reclassification.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for a separate vote on the respectice amendments offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The amendment to the amendment comes first.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LONGWORTH). As the Chair understands it, there is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. STAFFORD. I offered two amendments. I ask for a division of the amendments offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. The amendment of the gentleman to my amendments is one single proposition, and it is not divisible in its nature. It is to strike out the words "the Civil Service Commission" wherever they occur. That is not a divisible amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is divisible.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendments reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, both amendments will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 3, line 16, after the word "herein," insert:

"In making such allocations the heads of departments shall consult with the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency and shall avail themselves of all pertinent information in the possession of both bodies."

"The Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Efficiency shall render the Bureau of the Budget such cooperation and assistance as the Bureau of the Budget may require for the performance of its duties under this act."

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Strike out the words "Civil Service Commission" where they appear in both amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the first amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 8 ayes and 35 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, in the first amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey I move to strike out the word "shall" and to insert the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the first amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOWELL) there were 9 ayes and 36 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the second amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, lines 15 to 19, inclusive, strike out the matter following the word "thereunder" in line 15 and insert the following:

"If the compensation schedules contain no specifications exactly defining the work of a particular position to be allocated, the head of the department shall allocate such position to the grade which in his judgment contains the specification of work most nearly comparable to that pertaining to such position, giving due regard to the mental and physical requirements of the position and to the preparation and training necessary therefor. From and after the effective date of this act no employee shall be paid a salary exceeding the maximum rate or less than the minimum rate prescribed for the grade to which his position is allocated: Provided, That during the probational employment of a new appointee or during the first six months' service of any employee on new work the head of a department may, in his discretion, fix the salary of such appointee or employee in the next grade below that to which his position is allocated."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the committee that it occurs to me that this provision ought to be in any bill that is adopted. It is a physical impossibility, I take it, to make reclassifications or defining grades that will exactly cover every position of the employee in the service of the Government; so there should be a discretion lodged somewhere, so that whenever it is discovered that there is a position not defined, one that does not come within the classification on that particular work that this person is to do, that is not placed within the allocation of any other position, that some one should be charged with the responsibility, temporarily, of placing that man, during a probationary period at least, and determining where he shall be placed and the salary he may receive. It ought to be in this bill or any other bill, because of the necessities and emergencies and exigencies that will arise, no matter how perfect the bill may be.

It also authorizes the head of the department during the first six months, if he deems it necessary, to place him in the grade whereby he will receive a salary next lower than the grade he hopes to be qualified to fill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. With reference to the lines on page 4—

That whenever an existing position or a position hereafter created by law shall not fairly and reasonably be allocable to one of the grades of the several services described in the compensation schedules, the Bureau of the Budget shall adopt for such position the range of compensation prescribed for a grade, or a division thereof, comparable therewith as to qualifications and duties.

Does not the gentleman think that that covers what the gentleman desires?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; that is an attempt to take care of it, but it has a fixity about it that can not be applicable in every case, for the reasons I have suggested. There will be numerous occasions when positions will arise where it will be absolutely impossible to know where to place the individual and the salary he should receive.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana. As has been pointed out, where the position is not fairly and reasonably allocable it is provided that it be taken care of by the Bureau of the Budget. All these points in the gentleman's amendment are covored properly and logically and in their right order in the provisions of the bill. The gentleman from Indiana, as is well known, has sought to substitute his bill for that of the committee. He has sought to substitute the matter contained in his bill for the provisions in this, and this particular amendment is merely a portion of his bill which he seeks to substitute and has sought to substitute from time to time. He is by piecemeal endeavoring to substitute his bill for that reported by the committee. There is no need of the provisions in his amendment, because all of those provisions are in here. It is a question which bill the committee is going to continue to consider.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 17, after the word "compensation," insert the words "shall be reviewed and," so that the sentence will read:

"Such allocations and rates of compensation shall be reviewed and may be revised by the Bureau of the Budget."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Bureau of the Budget, in order effectively to revise and approve allocations, may make all necessary rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act and provide such subdivisions of services, titles of positions, and definitions of duties as it may deem necessary.

The Bureau of the Budget may divide the positions in a grade into divisions according to the difficulty of the work performed, and may fix minimum and maximum rates of compensation for such divisions within the salary range of such grade.

That whenever an existing position or a position hereafter created by law shall not fairly and reasonably be allocable to one of the grades of the several services described in the compensation schedules, the Bureau of the Budget shall adopt for such position the range of compensation prescribed for a grade, or a division thereof, comparable therewith as to qualifications and duties.

The Bureau of the Budget shall make necessary adjustments in compensation for positions carrying maintenance.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 3, line 20, strike out the entire section 4 and insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That the President shall promulgate suitable rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect, and is authorized to supplement the compensation schedules from time to time as may be necessary, to the end that they shall be current and readily applicable to all positions covered by this act, and to the further end that all rates of compensation shall be fixed upon the basis of equal pay for like or similar services and all just and reasonable compensation for all employments: Provided, That this shall not be construed to authorize the President to increase or to decrease the number of grades specified in the compensation schedules or to alter or modify the salary or salary ranges pertaining thereto."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it may be seen from this amendment that the purpose of it is to take from the Budget Bureau the responsibility which is sought to be placed upon the budget by the text of the original bill. If the budget is to be successful, it ought to be permitted to discharge the duties for which it was created, and it should not thus early when it is yet going through the experimental stage be loaded down with a lot of matters that are entirely extraneous to that bureau. I am revealing no secret, because what I am about to say is likewise known to the chairman of this committee, when I say that the budget officers are fearful of having this responsibility placed upon it. The Assistant Director of the Budget informs me, and I think he informed the chairman of this committee, that the Budget Bureau is not the place for this responsibility; it has no machinery whereby it could discharge the duties attempted to be imposed upon it, and which will be imposed upon it if this bill is passed as originally written.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the Bureau of the Budget is to be too busy to do this work, does the gentleman think that the President of the United States has ample leisure, personally, to attend to it? And if not, in whom is he going to vest it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, that same sort of specious argument might be urged with reference to any bill offered here where it is desired or attempted to make a lot of new places. It will be plainly seen that one of the purposes of this section is to have a lot of new machinery created within the budget. The first thing that will happen if this bill becomes a law as it is written will be the creation within the Bureau of the Budget of a bureau of efficiency, completely equipped and manned with directors and subdirectors, with agents and subagents, with economists and subeconomists, with fancy salaries. That is as sure to come as that day follows night.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that the budget in order to get that information before the committees must necessarily have this information, and must necessarily have a department to secure that in order to make up a proper budget?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They would secure that then as they secure it now. How did this first budget receive its information? It received it, if you please, from these various departments. It will so receive the information then, and that is the purpose of it. The budget is not for the purpose of establishing a policy; it is not for the purpose of creating new avenues of government; it is not for the purpose of helping create new agencies to expend money. One of the things it was created for was for the purpose of saving money.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman said this may result in the creation of a bureau of efficiency in the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does not the gentleman think it would be salutary to have the existing Bureau of Efficiency function under the control and direction of the Bureau of the Budget?

Wr. WOOD of Indiana. I say no, for the reason that you are going to cause conflict the very minute you do that thing, and that is the reason it was separated from the civil service. Anyone who has had experience for a number of years with these departments knows how jealous they are of their jurisdiction and of the encroachment of another upon it. If you are going to weaken this budget institution, this so-called reclassification bill, you will do the very thing which you are attempting to do here. If, on the other hand, you want to create a piece of machinery that is going to establish the best way to bring about the purpose so much desired, you are going to keep responsibility single, so far as possible, instead of dividing it as you are attempting to do, and if you wish to destroy the budget, keep on heaping this character of duties upon it and it will not last for five years.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Where does the gentleman get his information that he gave us regarding the additional cost of, perhaps, $20,000,000 that this bill would entail?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That information comes from experts who were selected from the various departments to figure on these classifications, taking the maximum and minimum and striking an average. I do not know exactly how it was done, but it is the result of those figures that I have received. I am told that within the District of Columbia the increase will amount to $8,000,000—some say as high as $10,000,000—and if you include all of the civil-service employees, both inside and outside of the District, it will amount to about $20,000,000.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. What is the gentleman's understanding of the provision in lines 23, 24, and 25, which authorizes the Bureau of the Budget to provide such subdivisions of services, titles of positions, and definitions of duties as it may deem necessary?

Does that in the opinion of the gentleman authorize the increase in the personnel of the Bureau of the Budget itself?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The bureau will find a way of increasing it. If they do not do it directly under the terms of the law it will be done by implication; and it will be absolutely impossible, it would be a physical impossibility, for the budget to do this work. As was stated here a while ago, Mr. Dawes, in appearing before our committee the other day, said if it had not been for the details they gathered here, there, and yonder he never could have gotten anywhere. Under the law they are only given four men to do this work. They have independent work and should not be charged with all this responsibility that they are seeking to bestow by virtue of this amendment.

Mr. ROACH. If the gentleman will permit another question. What I was interested in was in trying to determine whether or not this bill really contemplates a material increase in the personnel or the membership of the Bureau of the Budget; whether this section does authorize such an increase or not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That I am unable to say, but I expect the chairman of the committee could answer better than I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say in closing we ought not to destroy the budget; let us keep it clean by not adding this detailed and foreign responsibility to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an observation at this point about the work of the Bureau of the Budget. Now, the contention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is to the effect that Congress never contemplated when it created the Bureau of the Budget that it would have anything to do with the setting of salaries and expenses in the departments, and so forth. Section 209 of the act which created the Bureau of the Budget reads as follows:

The bureau, when directed by the President, shall make a detailed study of the departments and establishments for the purpose of enabling the President to determine what changes (with a view of securing greater economy and efficiency in the conduct of the public service) should be made in (1) the existing organizations, activities, and methods of business of such departments or establishments; (2) the appropriations therefor; (3) the assignment of particular activities to particular services.

Why, that is exactly what this bill does. It assigns the particular activities of a certain employee, for example, to the professional service. It assigns the activity of another employee to the clerical service. It assigns the activities of another employee to the custodial service. That is exactly in line with one of the duties of the Bureau of the Budget to perform at the request of the President. I continue to read section 209:

(4) The regrouping of services.

Now, it occurs to me that that section which I have just read shows that it was clearly in the contemplation of Congress when we set up the Bureau of the Budget that it should be the right arm of the President, in so far as economy is concerned, when it comes to dealing with the executive departments, and it is not illogical to delegate to it this authority, but, on the contrary, it is fit and proper.

System and uniformity and fair adjustment of pay for equal work is what we need in the Government service.

Has anyone suggested a better method of obtaining it than the plan of the committee which we propose? I think not.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the learned discourse of these gentlemen on the committee and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] in discussing this amendment and the provisions of the bill, and I can not gather which will be economical and which will not. The gentleman from Indiana says that the method proposed by the committee will not be economical but will be extravagant. He does not in any way show us by his proposed course whether it is going to reduce expenditures or make it economical. Now, I am like the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER], who awhile ago startled us by saying that a bread line had been established up in his country somewhere. That is a very painful communication to this House. Why, only yesterday and this morning the papers of this city were teeming with praises of the administration because it had raised the price of Liberty bonds almost to par. I commend to my friend to advise his constituents that they sell their Liberty bonds and not get in the bread line. I commend another thing, and that is that while those bonds have been going up that corn has gone down to 15 cents a bushel. They ought to be able to sell their Liberty bonds and buy corn at 15 cents a bushel and keep out of the bread line.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do.

Mr. CROWTHER. I just want to say to my friend that the folks in my district who are now standing in the bread line were fortunate enough once to own Liberty bonds, but they have not got them now.

Mr. STEVENSON. They have parted with them, and therefore they are not able to buy corn.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will yield, in speaking of the bread line and the reduced price of corn, the gentleman remembers we were promised a return to normalcy.

Mr. STEVENSON. But 15 cents for corn in the western fields is not normalcy, and with wheat something like 60 per cent now of what it was 12 months ago, where bonds have gone up, and corn, wheat, horses, cows, and everything else have gone down, these people in the bread line ought to be able to get their wheat and corn cheaper. I am like the gentleman from New York. I want these distinguished gentlemen to tell us which is economical, so that I may be able to know which way to vote, where, as it is, they have left us in a fog thus far.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: In line 21, on page 3, before the word "revise," insert the word "review" and a comma, so that the sentence will read: "That the Bureau of the Budget, in order effectively to review, revise, and improve allocations," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virgiain [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Bureau of the Budget shall report to Congress at the beginning of the session following the passsage of this act schedules of positions, grades, and salaries for the field services, which shall follow the principles and rules of the compensation schedules in so far as these are applicable to the field services. This report shall include a list prepared by the head of each department allocating all of the field positions in his department to their appropriate grades in said schedules and fixing the proposed rate of compensation of each employee thereunder in accordance with the rules prescribed in section 6 herein.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in line 17, the words "at the beginning of the session" and inserting the words "as soon as practicable."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Page 4, line 17, strike out the words "at the beginning of the session" and insert "as soon as practicable."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to think that is a good amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The thought of the committee in fixing this time limit was that the allocation of personnel in the field and the revisions of such allocation should be made contemporaneously with the work done in the District of Columbia. It is true that there exist more complete data here in the District, but the field service falls in the main along certain broad lines, and instead of making two bites of this job and making the allocation in the District, and after that is completed starting de novo and making it for the field, we thought the two works could run side by side. However, if there is a danger that it could not be completed if this time limit remains, I see no great objection to the change. The only thing is that if we leave it as it is it will be a direction that Congress expects the work to run along contemporaneously, while otherwise it may be thought by those who are charged originally with preparing the field classification and allocation that they have plenty of time after they have got the first job finished before they consider doing the second. We can always extend time if we find it physically impossible to do the work within time specified.

Mr. MANN. From the legislative point of view I am fairly familiar with the Government service. I think my friend from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] is somewhat mistaken in thinking that the Government service outside of Washington is very similar to the Government service inside of Washington. This is an administrative work here; that is field work there. The two services are entirely different. Take the Post Office Department, with which we are all familiar, with the offices in the Post Office building down here in Washington, and allocating the places down here in the Post Office building in the administrative service would not be a very great one. Much less would that be the case in the Agricultural Department, in the Interior Department, or in other departments of the Government. Now, I would like to have the work done just as soon as possible. When we create a commission of Congress, as we frequently do, there has been, I think—I may be mistaken—no instance where the commission did not ask for an extension of time, Congress being in session usually. The Commission on Reclassification in the Government Service, which was appointed, had its time extended once or twice. But if you direct the Bureau of the Budget to make a report on the first Monday of next December, Congress being not in session, I hope, for several months before that time the bureau must make some kind of a report. I fear it will not be a very satisfactory or carefully considered report if they are not able to do it within that time. While I hope they will be able to report at that time, I would rather give them a little more time and have a report that we can rely upon than require them to report without knowledge.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted and the language stricken out, what would happen in the event they could not find time to make this report before next December? Then it would not require the submission of their report even at that time unless some provision was made.

Mr. MANN. That is just what I am saying. It would not require a submission of the report before they are able to report.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That would make it possible if you provided that the report would be filed later than the 1st of December, 1922.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The remarks I made in the form of inquiry to the gentleman from Illinois merely set forth what the committee had in mind when they wrote the language as it is. The committee has no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in determining the compensation to be established for the several employees the following rules shall govern:

1. In computing the existing compensation of an employee, any bonus which the employee receives shall be included.

2. If the employee is receiving compensation less than the minimum salary of the grade or division thereof in which his duties fall, the compensation shall be increased to that minimum rate.

3. If the employee is receiving compensation within the range of salary prescribed for the appropriate grade at one of the rates fixed therein no change shall be made in the existing compensation.

4. If the employee is receiving compensation within the range of salary prescribed for the appropriate grade, but not at one of the rates fixed therein, the compensation shall be increased to the next higher rate.

5. All vacant or new positions shall be filled at the minimum rate of the appropriate grade or division thereof.

6. In determining the rate of compensation which an employee shall receive the principle of equal compensation for equal work irrespective of sex shall be followed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 5, strike out lines 7, 8, and 9.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not sure that I understand exactly what this language means, but if it means what I think it means, it ought not to be in this bill.

I take it that it means to include as a part of the basic salary the present bonus which we are paying to some of the clerks, and if that is not correct I would like to have the chairman of the committee so state. In view of the silence of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], I conclude that that is what it means. If it means that, gentlemen of the committee, it means to continue as a part of the permanent salary of the clerks a bonus which we gave them as a war measure entirely, and which we have said on repeated occasions in this House and to the country at large that we would stop as soon as this war was over. Now we propose to continue it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BLACK. I wanted to ask the gentleman this simple question: Having reclassified all the postal employees in the Government service; having reclassified the school-teachers of the District of Columbia; having reclassified the policemen and firemen, and having given them an average increase of $500 or $600 each on basic salary, does the gentleman think it would be equitable to these other employees to go back to the basic salary existing before the war?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is the trouble with us in this House. The gentleman from Texas is a good legislator, and he is a man for whose opinion I have great respect, but the trouble with his argument and with us, gentlemen, in this House—I have seen it during the five years of my service here—is that if we want to put anything over, we always stand up and call attention to something else that has been done by some other Congress, and say that because we have done that, therefore we shall do this.

If a thing is wrong, the time to discontinue it is when it is up. I do not care what Congress has done about some other class of employees. I think this is wrong. I think this is the time to stop it.

Now, if it is the right thing to do to increase the wages of some of these employees—and I think it may be, because I think some of them are underpaid; I am frank to admit that—let it be done in a systematic way, in a scientific way, by increasing the wages of those who are entitled to an increase, and keeping down the wages of those not entitled to a raise. But I do not think it is a good plan to take a civil-service clerk who is now getting $240 more than he is entitled to and putting that bonus on permanently. It should be taken off. If we can not do this scientifically now, we should wait until we have more information before we attempt to legislate upon the subject. It is wrong in principle. I do not think any of us want to go to the country to-day and say to the ex-service men that we could not give a bonus to them because of the state of the finances of the country, and still admit that we are giving to every clerk and civil employee a war bonus of $240. [Applause.]

I do not know that anything I may say here will have any influence on your minds; but, gentlemen, it is unwise, and it is unwise from the standpoint of public policy, to do that and resist the appeal of the ex-service men of this country. If you want to raise some of these salaries, then raise them, but not in the way of continuing the bonus. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, my record in the House for economy will probably compare with that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], though I freely admit his is good. But I think it is grossly unfair to refer to the increase, the temporary increase, which was given to the employees of the District, as a bonus. I think it is unfortunate that the increase was ever referred to as a bonus.

For example, in regard to an employee who was receiving a basic salary of $1,300 a year—and that is more than the average which prevailed at the time the war began—if that employee's salary was increased $240, representing less than an increase of 20 per cent, I do not regard such increase as any more of a bonus than that which was given to the railroad employees by the Railroad Administration during Government control, which amounted to an aggregate of 52 per cent, and which was increased after the period of Government control another 20 per cent. I do not regard it as any more of a bonus than that which Congress gave to the postal employees in the first Madden reclassification bill, which, while temporary, amounted to $200 for each employee. That increase was just as much a bonus, if you are going to call it a bonus, as the $120 increase which we gave to the employees in the District of Columbia the first year of the war. But we did not stop as to postal employees with the Madden temporary bill of $200 increase for each employee which raised them from original grade 1 at $800 to grade 1 at $1,000. We did not stop there. We did not stop until we had enacted a permanent reclassification bill which made grade 1 not $1,000 but $1,400, increasing all postal employees on an average of $600 each over the old basic salaries, or an average of at least 35 per cent.

Now, the only thing the committee had in view in making up this bill was to prepare a uniform system of classification, make it workable along practical lines, and prepare a salary range which would be fair, equally to the employees and to the Government. We believe that the bill measurably meets with that requirement.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Mr. FESS. I have been disturbed on this item myself. I agree with the gentleman that the calling of this thing a bonus was very unfortunate.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. The calling of this a bonus was very unfortunate. A bonus carries with it the idea of a gift or a gratuity. I do not regard the salary increases to Government employees in that way any more than I would salary increases in private employment.

Mr. FESS. We made it up because of the excessive cost of living during the war.

Mr. BLACK. Exactly.

Mr. FESS. Here is my difficulty: Now we are away from that in a degree, and we are going to count the bonus as an additional salary, no matter who got it or how much he was being paid up to $2,500; and I am wondering whether that is scientific or not. I agree with my friend in this, that we ought either to repeal this bonus altogether and stop it or else we ought to add it to the salary, one or the other.

Mr. BLACK. Let me answer the gentleman from Ohio by making this statement, that the bill does not necessarily perpetuate the salary increase commonly referred to as the bonus. When the bill was originally considered by the committee it did contain a paragraph in section 6 which provided that in the reclassification no employee should be reduced in salary. But the committee struck that provision out, because we took the view that if an employee fitted into any particular grade, there is where he should go, and he should receive the compensation for that grade, even though it meant a reduction in salary. It has been often said on the floor of the House that some employees have been promoted to their present position through favoritism and are receiving more compensation than they should. If there are any such cases the committee does not care to perpetuate them and has tried to avoid doing so in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. To be frank with the House, the practical workings of the bill, in my opinion, will in most instances carry the compensation which the employee is receiving at present. But the fact is often referred to, and, I think, is uncontradicted, that even with the decline in the cost of living during the past 12 months the basic index figure stands 55 per cent more than it did in 1913. Taking the basic salaries as a basis, the average Government employee does not receive more than $1,300. That would mean that if we perpetuate the $240 per annum which he has received as increase in salary it will be approximately 20 per cent increase over the prewar wages. Of course, if the Government employees had received any increase in wages such as 50 or 60 per cent, as was the case in most private employment, I would be strongly in favor of bringing it down some, but such was not the case.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. FESS. My only concern was that the bonus of $240 applies to all grades up to a certain salary. Now, is it not true that we are increasing the salaries of all people who had that bonus, $240, without reference to the type of work that they are doing?

Mr. BLACK. No; as I stated to the gentleman a while ago, the bill does not do that.

Mr. FESS. That will be the practical effect of it, will it not?

Mr. BLACK. I think in allocating the positions most of them will receive their basic wage plus the $240. But that will not be true in all cases. If their class of work puts them in a grade where the compensation is less than they now receive, then they will be reduced.

Mr. FESS. At any rate, we get rid of the bonus idea.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. It ought never to have been called a bonus. It was an increase in salary considerably less than that in most private employments. This bill now proposes to reclassify all salaries and do away with the bonus idea entirely.

Mr. FESS. That is a virtue.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The discussion upon this proposed amendment to my mind has very greatly emphasized how unscientific is the fixing of salaries under this bill. The bonus proposition was unscientific, as everybody will admit. It was proposed as a temporary measure to assist the clerical forces of the Government to get by the high cost of living. It was done without any scientific consideration or reason. The arbitrary sum of $240 was agreed upon, and that it should be given to everyone whose salary was $2,500 or less. Now, if a particular employee received a salary of $2,501 he was not entitled to this bonus, whereas if he received $2,500 he was entitled to an additional $240, thus giving him $239 more than one who was receiving a salary of $2,501.

Mr. MANN. Surely the gentleman does not want that statement to go into the RECORD.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What statement?

Mr. MANN. The statement that he has just made.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What is that?

Mr. MANN. That the man who received less than $2,500 would under the bonus receive more than a man who was getting $2,501. The bonus provision took care of that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The bonus provision did not take care of it, for this reason: The bonus provision provided that those who were receiving $2,500 or less were entitled to the bonus of $240. Is not that correct?

Mr. MANN. The bonus provision contained a proviso that if a man was receiving less than $2,500 he should receive the bonus, or a part of it, but not so as to make his total compensation more than $2,500.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken. There was no piecemeal about it. He either got $240 or else he did not get it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think I am correct about it. But be that as it may, everybody has admitted all the way through that it was an unscientific proposition; and if it was an unscientific proposition then, it is unscientific now. If it was unscientific in its application, it is unscientific under the proposal of this measure to fix it as a basis of compensation now.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman in his own bill that he introduced, H. R. 8921, classifies typists in grade 5. Now, typists under the basic salary would come in at $900, but I notice that the gentleman himself has started the initial grade at $1,140. Now, if the gentleman did not intend in the drawing of that bill to add $240 to $900, I would like to have him explain what is the purpose of making it $1,140 all through his own bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That might be true.

Mr. BLACK. All through the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; not all through the bill; in many instances it does occur, and in many instances it goes above, but in far more it goes below. But that was a proposition to fix the salaries under that schedule upon scientific lines in describing the job they were employed to do. While here they are fixed arbitrarily and they provide that the bonus shall be included. If it means what it says, it means that whatever raise there is it must be in addition to the $240 bonus. It is just as unscientific now as it was under the compulsion of existing circumstances when it was adopted arbitrarily during the war.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Was the gentleman from Indiana quoted correctly in the Star a short time ago when he appealed for a support of his bill on the ground that it would preserve the present salaries and preserve the bonus?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know what the gentleman read in the Star and I do not propose to be responsible for all that is said about me in the newspapers, or what is put in my mouth by the newspapers. I do not remember of ever having said anything of that character, and if I did say it I did not intend to. It always has been contended that the bonus was a temporary makeshift, and why in the world the committee in deliberating upon an equitable reclassification bill should adopt an unscientific proposition such as that is and make it the basis upon which to fix permanent salaries is beyond my understanding.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. As I understand, this bonus was simply an increase in the salaries of employees to meet war conditions and the raise in prices in Washington, that are still high. Now, Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said in the discussion of this bill about "Old Man People," and a great deal has been said about whom we serve. Well, we all get our commissions from that old gentleman, I take it. I know I am responsible to that elderly gentleman, and now also his better half, for my stay here. I recall that my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who spoke in opposition to this measure when it was before the House at another and recent date, he referred to the fact that "Old Man People" was not being represented here and said that these salaries run up as high as $7,000. I do not think there is any clause of this bill where it is possible to increase salaries to that extent, except one, and in that one practically the head, or acting head, of a great department. My friend went on to state that employees of the Government worked not many hours a day here and that he at one time worked a "one-eyed mule" to a "one-eyed plow" over in the "cut-over" lands in Mississippi. That is commendable to a great extent in my friend from Mississippi, but if he had his choice now of going back to that one-eyed mule and one-eyed plow or remain where he is, he would choose to remain an honored Member of Congress.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; I yield to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. I never plowed with a "one-eyed mule" or a "one-eyed plow" in my life. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. Well, the gentleman should correct the RECORD. He is in the RECORD as having pulled the bell cord over a one-eyed mule and a one-eyed plow in Mississippi. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Arkansas, my friend Mr. WINGO, says that he used to drag a cotton sack over in the red hills of Arkansas. It is very commendable, but if my good friend had his choice to go back to the cotton sack and the red hills and pluck the fleecy staple I think he would stay in Congress. [Laughter.] I myself might qualify by saying that I was a superintendent of a flock of sheep for eight years. That is what they call it now, but in my day they called them herders and "paseoras." I was barefoot most of the time, but if I had my choice to go back to that flock of sheep on the honeycombed hills of western Texas I think I would remain right here, and I hope the people will respect my choice. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; I yield to my good friend from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. What did the gentleman say about my being connected with a cotton sack?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I said that the gentleman said he dragged a cotton sack, and I think it was very commendable in him. But if he had his choice, he would not go back to the cotton sack, but would remain right here, an honor to his district and a useful man in Congress. Let me say there is a provision whereby salaries can be reduced if it becomes necessary. My friend from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] says there is no provision for reducing the salaries. I do not read it that way, because if he will read the latter part of section 7, it says:

That reductions in compensation and dismissals shall be made by heads of departments in all cases whenever the efficiency ratings warrant, as provided in section 9 herein.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman does not suppose they will ever find any, does he?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then the gentleman wants to go on record as saying that there is no honesty in the heads of these departments, because under the bill if they are honest they will decrease salaries where the employees do not come up to the rating. That is what this bill says. Now, my friends, as to what kind of a Congressman I am making, I do not know—that is for my constituents to say—but I do know I am a good messenger. [Laughter.] I met my friend the Senator from Ohio the other morning—we board at the same place—and he asked me where I was going so early. I told him I was going out on my rounds of the departments, to present requests from my constituents that I looked after personally, and he said that he would join me in a moment if I would only wait until he had his breakfast. In this way I have become acquainted with all the department heads and many of the subordinates. As I understand, this measure permits the rewarding of merit. Take a man like Mr. Batson, in the Internal Revenue Bureau. I want to state to you gentlemen that a more efficient man is not employed in this Government, and as I understand he draws a salary of something over $3,000 per annum.

Will any man who comes in contact with that gentleman say that he is overpaid? Take Mr. Chatterton, who is his able assistant, who keeps in close touch with not only his department but those in other units of the Internal Revenue Income Department, will anyone claim he is overpaid? Also, Mr. Tonnis, of the Mexican Division, State Department, and many others I could mention. And take Mrs. Busby, that splendid lady, the wife of the secretary to Uncle JOE CANNON, who is employed in the Bureau of War Risk——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I think I want only about two minutes. As I say, take Mrs. Busby, who is employed in the Bureau of War Risk, who will assist you not only in her department but in any other in that great bureau, and do you want to tell me that people of that kind and efficiency ought not to be rewarded according to the service which they render? Take Col. Wills, in the Department of Internal Revenue, a very efficient man from the good old State of Kentucky. Those kind of men and women ought to be paid according to the service which they render. If I understand this bill, the purpose of it is to reward the very sort of people whom I have mentioned, who are giving very efficient service to the Government, and who can not be properly rewarded under present conditions and provisions of the law.

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to say to the gentleman that while all these people the gentleman speaks of may be very competent and masterful, that we all of us have our special set of friends in the various departments. I could name another list of people who do not stand so high, but who do their work just as well as the people the gentleman mentioned do, for less money.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman think that they are getting more money than they deserve?

Mr. CROWTHER. No; I do not.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And again I say take the assistant director of the Bureau of War Risk, Maj. John G. MacDonald; a more efficient and courteous gentleman does not exist. He is doing a splendid work and is underpaid, and I might mention hundreds of other splendid men and women whom I have met personally in various departments of this Government who are underpaid.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman misunderstands me if he thinks that in my remarks I have suggested that I am against their having as much money as they desire. I said that they deserve it in this paradise of profiteering, the city of Washington, but I am against doing anything for them until we do something for the soldier who has not anything to do, and who is to-day standing in a bread line, who is out of a job, and who has never had the service that we promised him when he came back. I do not think we should do anything for these people until we have done for them. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. I agree with the gentleman in respect to his statement concerning the soldiers. I voted for the cash bonus and every other kind of bonus.

Mr. CROWTHER. And so did I.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And I was one of the Democrats on this side who voted for the bonus bill, and I shall vote for it again if you Republicans will only give me and my colleagues on this side a chance.

Mr. CROWTHER. I am glad that the gentleman represents the intelligent wing of the Democratc Party.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. I admit it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The majority of the Democrats voted for it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That is true, as I recall. The majority of Democrats voted for it. I know I did. The responsibility for the failure of the measure rests with the majority party in this House, who have not kept their promise to the soldiers or the dependents of those soldiers who sacrificed their all in many instances, and who have not yet been awarded adjusted compensation, but only promises from you Republicans. Ah, you are "promising gentlemen," I must say. But if I understood my friend from New York—I think I did understand him correctly—he suggested that there would be no reductions under this bill. It is permissible.

Mr. CROWTHER. The law says there may be; I do not think there will be.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Oh, that is the gentleman's opinion. My opinion is that there will be where it is shown to be necessary and raises where it merits, and therefore it is a matter of a difference of opinion. I am in favor of this measure. I believe it is drawn along the right lines, and because there are inefficient public servants in the District of Columbia, I want to state that that does not carry with it the implication that they are all inefficient. There are people serving this Government to-day who are not getting the salaries that they should get. Take the poor charwomen about whom so much has been said, who get down on their knees and scrub out the Office Building and get $30 or $40 a month. Is there any gentleman on the Republican side who will contend that those women who clean out our offices, who get there before the sun rises in the morning and work many hours, under this bill would be getting a higher salary than they deserve? I do not believe anyone does. Let us fix it so a competent bureau can pass upon efficiency and a law that will permit the rewarding of merit where merit is due. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this bonus proposition I want to get a little information if I may. When does the compensation provided for in this act take effect?

Mr. LEHLBACH. At the beginning of the fiscal year next after the report of the budget, based upon the classification.

Mr. MANN. The budget is reported the 1st of next December.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Then the salaries will begin in the following July.

Mr. MANN. They would not begin until the following fiscal year?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. It will not be in effect in the next fiscal year?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No.

Mr. MANN. There will be no bonus in the next fiscal year unless it is provided for by the appropriation bill, assuming that that is the way it will be provided. I would suggest to my friend from Indiana and the other members of the Committee on Appropriations, who have been opposing the inclusion of the bonus as a part of the basic salary, that the basic salary, according to this bill, is not the basic salary for this fiscal year but the basic salary for the next fiscal year.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. And unless the bonus is included in the next fiscal year it will not be included in the basic salary fixed by this bill for compensation. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then there is no reason for the inclusion of the language.

Mr. MANN. There may be reason for the inclusion of the language.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What is it?

Mr. MANN. Congress will take into consideration, I take it, in fixing the salaries of employees for the next fiscal year the fact that that will be the basic salary under which compensation will be made under the terms of this law if it is enacted into law.

And it is up to the Congress to determine hereafter what that basic salary shall be, whether it shall be inclusive of the bonus or not.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. FESS. Unless the Committee on Appropriations provides for a bonus beyond what the employees are receiving this year——

Mr. MANN. There is no bonus now that extends beyond June 30 next.

Mr. FESS. It will end June 30 unless it is allowed again?

Mr. MANN. Unless it is allowed again by act of Congress.

Mr. FESS. It will not apply to this bill.

Mr. MANN. The bonus now in existence will not apply to this bill if the amendment in the last section of the bill goes into the law, and it will be up to the Congress, it will be up primarily to the Committee on Appropriations, and that is what I am suggesting to these gentlemen who will have to act upon it in the future.

Mr. FESS. That means the Committee on Appropriations will allow it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, there are many ways, of course, of getting the bonus into the law. It may go in in the House, it may go in in the Senate and be agreed to by the House. Oh, there are other ways of "skinning the cat."

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will allow another question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The bonus, as I understand it, was to measure the excess of the high cost of living during the war. Is it not an unscientific plan to add that amount to every salary if we have dismissed the idea of a bonus?

Mr. MANN. Well, there is no scientific method of fixing salaries. I have heard a great deal about that, but I do not think there is any. We were up against it. The bonus was a compromise. It was a question of adding to salaries in some way during the war or else lose the employees of the Government. The Congress provided for a temporary bonus. It has continued that temporary bonus ever since. I am not saying now whether it ought to be continued or not. I was calling attention to the situation so our distinguished friends on the Committee on Appropriations might know what they were up against.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in what Mr. MANN says, as I always am. I have great regard for his opinion. He says that the war bonus of $240 is not included on account of the fact that it will be stopped before the period begins. Then there is no reason for putting this language into the law. It is unsafe and it may incline the Committee on Appropriations hereafter to take an erroneous idea of what is in our minds. I do not believe that a system of bonuses is a good thing. I do not believe that it is a scientific way of fixing salaries. I do not think it is a good thing to do, even if the Committee on Appropriations should conclude to do so in the future. If you keep this language in the law—

Any bonus which the employee receives shall be included—that by implication at least says to the Committee on Appropriations that we are looking with favor upon that sort of a proposition. If these employees need additional wages, let us fix the additional wages, but the idea of a bonus ought to be eliminated from this bill. It ought to be eliminated from our appropriations because it is not scientific or a safe way to proceed.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it not a further fact, which, as Mr. MANN says, is true, and I believe it is, that the Committee on Appropriations and the Congress might feel fully justified in continuing it for at least one more year, because prices had not sufficiently fallen and we would not feel like continuing it indefinitely.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It may be so, but what good can be accomplished by putting this language in here; what is the idea of having it in here anyhow?

Mr. ROACH. If Congress did see fit to continue the bonus another year, then the leaving of this section in the bill would operate——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. To continue it indefinitely, but it would be better for the Congress in the future, if it wants to give a bonus, not to predetermine the proposition.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, it is only a question of whether it shall be applied in this way——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I said in the beginning, if the gentleman from Ohio will permit me to say, a lot of these clerks and employees ought to have more wages, but it ought to be allowed in a scientific way. To give some $240 would not be enough, but to give some $240 is too much, and I do not think we ought to do anything here by legislative expression that might be construed as we would not care to have it construed in the future, and I think it will help the bill if this language goes out.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is a good deal of misapprehension about this rule 1 in section 6. The debate shows the belief that by including in existing compensation the bonus it establishes basic pay and bonus in some way as a basis for the salaries fixed for the respective grades in the bill. It does not. All that section 1 does is that when for the purposes of comparison it is necessary to ascertain what a person is getting now we should find out what he is getting, not what he is theoretically getting. If John Doe is getting $1,140 let us say so, and not pretend he is getting $900. Therefore, to ascertain what the fact is, what the person is being paid, we define that what he actually is paid should be taken as a criterion. That that is not made the basis of rates of pay in the various grades is shown in grade 2 of the subprofessional service, in which the lowest basic pay is $900, and with bonus $1,140. The bill as reported by the committee says that the entrance pay for grade 2 shall be $1,080, having no relation to bonus. We did not draw these salary ranges with a view of conforming with salaries plus bonus but with what is right and fair and just, considering both the taxpayers' interests and adequate compensation for the work done by the employees. This is merely a convenient method of ascertaining what a person is really getting at the present time. If he is not getting the bonus when this bill goes into effect and when the allocations are made it will not be considered, because it says when we consider what a person is getting for compensation at the present time, we take what he actually is getting and not what his theoretical salary is, and the gentleman is mistaken when he says that is embraced in the salary schedules and is made a basis for them, because you will find the low salaries at the beginning of a grade are less than the basic salaries plus bonus at the present time.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I am rather at a loss to know just what this clause does if the chairman of the committee is correct. He lays down a rule that must be followed by others. It seems to me they did not follow their own rule according to his statement, because according to his statement they fixed the salaries irrespective of bonus. But I take it that that statement of his applies to people first entering the service, because if this rule applies when this law becomes effective, then in calculating the salary of those already in the service of course the bonus is to be included. If it does not mean that, it does not mean anything. But I want to give you just a moment's history about this $240.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. SISSON. I have only five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman can get more time. I think the gentleman misinterprets the word "computing." It does not mean determining; it means the summing up and calculating. It does not mean determining. If it meant determining the compensation, then the contention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would be correct, but it means summing up or calculating.

Mr. SISSON. It looks to me like a difference between tweedledee and tweedledum. I have not time to go into those refinements.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Section 6 says that in determining the compensation to be established for the several employees, so and so, and then this rule follows. I do not understand my friend.

Mr. SISSON. I have not time, of course, to yield for that purpose. But when this matter was first considered during the war this bonus was to cover the physical increase in the cost of food, and at first it was thought that $10 might take care of the physical increase in the cost of the food; but food continued to soar in prices, and it was made $20. Congress never intended to make the $240 a part of the base pay. It was put in as a bonus, with the expressed intention of not being an increase in salary. It was to be a gratuity paid to relieve the Government employees from the clutches of the Washington profiteers; but, like everything else done in government, when you are trying to treat fairly those people who are drawing salaries, and when you give them what was intended to be a temporary bonus, something they were not and are not entitled to by law, instantly it is contended that it was intended to be permanent, and they cry out, "That belongs to us." Now, in no private office in the world, when we give a man a quarter or half a dollar or $10 extra, does it mean an increase of his salary. But that is the evil that there is in precedents in Governments, and everybody now under the Hill is contending that the $240 is a permanent part of the pay. The very contrary is true. Every line of legislation shows it. They say that you are reducing their salary to take away the bonus, when such is not the case.

We knew if we increased a salary and put it in the permanent roll that that was a finality, but by having a bonus you could keep the salary and bonus separate, and you could cut the bonus off at any time. Here we find it contended the sacred bonus belongs to the employee. In other words, if Congress continues to follow the policy they are following now the men that run the grocery stores and own the apartment houses and real estate in this city will come and sit in this legislative body, and, in fact, fix what you are going to have to pay out of the Treasury to run this Government. Now, do you believe that? These people have got to live here. Now, do not let any real estate owner that happens to be in the House—and I hope there is none here—get mad now. The people outside of the District of Columbia who are paying these taxes do not like to be treated in this way. But I have been very close to this matter for some years. I want to say, without a moment's hesitation, that you can not go anywhere in this District without finding a sentiment prevailing amongst those people who own property and those people who sell something that it is the duty of Congress to maintain and keep them up as a part of the Capital City.

Now, if that is going to be the rule, and the Government is confined to this restricted area, then these gentlemen will determine, following the line of reasoning that has entered into the question here, what is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States for salaries.

Now, one other word in conclusion. I have investigated that subject as best I could, and my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has done so, and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON] also. I will say that if a man will go down into the Government offices he will find some faithful employee perhaps getting less than he ought to get, but a man of that kind is a notable exception. Such men are mountain peaks in the range. You will find here that, in proportion to the amount of service rendered, Government employees are getting more per unit of labor performed than in any other employment in the United States or in the world. That is an extreme and broad statement, but nevertheless it is true. One man told me that there were 11 men in his department whose duty it was to correct certain figures by going over a certain number of sheets, and this man was getting $1,600. He said, "If you will give me $2,500, I will take over the work of the entire room, and when the thing is over I will make fewer mistakes than the whole 11 of us make and never be worked a minute overtime."

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Do you believe that under this bill that gentleman would receive what he ought to receive?

Mr. SISSON. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Of course I do not think he will. You may vote for the reclassification bill, but under that he is not going to get it. You are going about the thing in the wrong way. You will not be able, in my judgment, to get salaries reduced until you have prepared an efficiency rating system and taken into consideration the units of labor performed. And when that is done you will find that all the union labor in this country will be against you, and you can not pass such a measure through this House or through the next House. Of course, under the present method of fixing wages it is a question of politics and not a question of determining the unit of labor performed and its value.

If the same method were followed in paying men who lay brick or men who make shoes they would no longer, as now, receive pay in accordance with the amount of work performed. You would attempt to pay the man who made 10 pairs of shoes the same wage that you paid to the man who made 1 pair of shoes, and the man who made 10 would soon wake up and say, "To hell with such a system; I will go to making 1 pair." That whole philosophy is wrapped up in this idea. You will not get an equitable condition established under this bill. When we endeavored to get an efficiency rating bill passed through the House and the Senate the employees of the Government had enough influence to have that bill vetoed by the President of the United States. Now, under an efficiency system, if it means anything, an employee that is efficient will say, "I want to be paid in accordance with what I do," while under the present system the inefficient employee will say, "I want to receive a living wage," regardless of what he does.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. VARE. Has the gentleman made any calculation as to how much more this bill will cost the Government?

Mr. SISSON. No; and no man on earth can make that calculation. The attempted calculation of that question by the greatest expert on earth would avail nothing.

Mr. VARE. Does this bill raise salaries?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and in a few years the salary of every man under the Government can be raised 100 per cent, if this bill is enacted into law. Salaries can be doubled under the terms of this bill, and does any man believe that it will not be done?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How can the salaries be raised without the vote of Congress? Does the gentleman believe they can?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do you suppose Congress will do that?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. They have increased some of these salaries more than 100 per cent already. They have increased the school-teachers' salaries more than 100 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman vote to increase the salaries of Congressmen?

Mr. SISSON. No; I was not here. Did the gentleman vote?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I never have voted and never will vote to increase my own compensation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not, either; but I think, from my knowledge of the facts——

Mr. SISSON. In other words, you are trying to measure the value of art, poetry, and service in dollars and cents. We shall have gotten down to the lowest basis that any nation can get down to when you get down to measuring everything in cold-blooded dollars and cents.

But, Mr. Chairman, to get back to where I was interrupted, these salaries are going to be increased. It is part of the game of the people who dominate the affairs of this District to increase Government salaries. You fall under the influence of that atmosphere. You hear it all the time. You lose your power of clear thinking here. Do not tell me you do not, because I know you do. When you get back home, close to the folks, you will have a different line of thought and action from what you have here. That is undoubtedly true. Every man is subject to the influence of his environment. Men will get up and misrepresent things. My good friend from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] has made a most terrible fling at me. He spoke of my having worked with a one-eyed mule and a one-eyed plow over in Mississippi. [Laughter.] It never did run in my blood to plow anything with one eye. [Laughter.]

Mr. QUIN. That was a bull-tongued plow that was one-eyed, that the gentleman was talking about. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman, but I do not care for more time.

Mr. LONDON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, when I voted for section 6 in the committee I was under the impression that section 6 secured to the Government employee a salary which would not be less than the salary now paid; that is, the basic salary, plus the bonus. Of course a 20 per cent increase, or what we called "a bonus," was not a scientific thing. Everybody admits that.

There is, however, very little science about the determination of wages. Wages are not fixed by any scientific rule or any moral code. In industry wages are governed by the merciless law of supply and demand, and in Government employment they are decided by politicians, and politicians do not follow any rule of reason or of science. They follow only expediency. They make compromises—compromises with common sense, compromises with conscience, provided they accomplish results or think they accomplish results. Every man here knows that the disparity between the purchasing power of the dollar of 30 years ago—and that is when wages were last fixed—and the purchasing power of the dollar of to-day is more than 20 per cent. From our daily experience we know that the purchasing power of the dollar to-day is not more than 60 per cent of the purchasing power of the dollar of 10 years ago or of 8 years ago.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. I do.

Mr. BEGG. I agree with the gentleman, and I think everybody else does; but I want to ask the gentleman if he believes that disparity in the purchasing power of the dollar is any worse to the Government employee than it is to the employee outside, in industries back in your home city?

Mr. LONDON. So far as the outside employee is concerned, he deserves all that he is getting. I agree with Morgan on the subject of the outside employee. When Morgan appeared before the Commission on Industrial Relations just before the war, and it was pointed out to him that the head of a family who was a longshoreman was getting $9 a week, Morgan said that he was getting all that was coming to him, and I agree with him that industrial workers do not get any more than their political sense and their intelligence justifies them in getting. They are getting what they are voting for.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman is losing sight of what I am trying to get across.

Mr. LONDON. I know what the gentleman is trying to get across, and I am trying to get something across, too. I tell the gentleman that the outside industrial workers are getting what they have voted for. They are getting nothing.

Mr. BEGG. Now, I will ask my question, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Is it not true that in the Government service, outside of positions which require technical skill, Government employees are higher paid than employees in civil life right here in the city of Washington?

Mr. LONDON. No. That was disputed by every man who testified before our committee.

Mr. BEGG. You can go right down town and find the pay of employees there, and they are not getting within 20 per cent of what we are paying in the Government service.

Mr. LONDON. If that is a fact, that is not any standard for me. I say to the gentleman that the standard of wages in private employment is not determined by any moral or ethical code, but by the extent to which the worker's resistance can be destroyed by the employer.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-seven Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8928, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, when 276 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in a list of the absentees to be published in the RECORD and in the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, when interrupted I was trying to prove to the committee that the so-called bonus was not a gratuity or a bonus in any sense of the word, but that it was only in part compensation of what we owed to the Government employees, that the disparity between the nominal dollar and the purchasing power of the dollar was so great that the cost of living has far outstripped any possible increase in nominal wages. After all, what the average man is interested in is not in the nominal sum which he earns, but in the purchasing power of the sum which he earns. Judged by that standard, you should not only retain the present bonus but you should increase it. I am opposed to the proposition of the committee of which I am a member to decrease the schedules which they have presented. Such a reduction will do a serious injustice to the Government employees. Let me quote to you from the report of the Congressional Joint Commission, the commission which Congress appointed and which made a conscientious and careful study of the subject. On this very question of the disparity between the nominal dollar and the real dollar, that report says on page 41:

> The average annual salary of the Government employees in the District of Columbia, according to the figures thus derived, was $1,096 in 1893. In 1919 it was $1,321, to which an allowance to cover the bonus must be added. Investigation indicates that $215 is a fair amount to allow for the bonus. If the bonus be included, the increase in the average salary amounts to approximately 40 per cent, whereas the increase in the cost of living in the same period was 159 per cent. The $1,536 salary of to-day will purchase only 54 per cent of the quantity of goods that could be bought with the $1,096 salary of 1893. If the attempt should be made to restore the purchasing power of the average salary of 1893, the average salary of to-day would have to be about $2,800.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman inform the committee when those statistics were obtained?

Mr. LONDON. Those statistics were obtained in 1920.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the present drop in prices?

Mr. LONDON. Nobody, I hope, will seriously contend that at the present moment the increase in the cost of living does not exceed 20 per cent. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin so contend?

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely not.

Mr. LONDON. That it does not exceed 20 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. I contend that the cost of living exceeds that.

Mr. LONDON. Exactly; and so, when we increase the salary of the Government employee by 20 per cent, we do him an injustice. Men dare to talk here about deducting the bonus from the present compensation. That is exactly the point which I was making when the committee rose on the point of no quorum made by the gentleman from Illinois. He seemed very much aroused.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Oh, the reason I made the point of no quorum was that I was sure the gentleman was going to make a good speech, and I wanted to get him an audience.

Mr. LONDON. I thank the gentleman for that. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I may want to submit some statistical data.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD was granted to Mr. HUDSPETH and to Mr. CROWTHER

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the pending amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 5, line 8, strike out the word "received" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as last received."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be again reported.

There being no objection, the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois) there were—ayes 40, noes 58.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers. I think the vote is close enough for us to have tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for tellers. Ten gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8928, had come to no resolution thereon.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Speaker, the roll call on Saturday morning showed about 100 Members absent. I was one of that hundred down at the Limitation of Armament Conference. I simply wanted to make that explanation on behalf of those Members who were there.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3250. An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to Augustus S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of absence indefinitely for my colleague [Mr. GILBERT] on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent,

Mr. DOMINICK was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

Mr. JAMES was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness in family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, December 13, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 13, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, though clouds and fog may hang about nature, we want to see light in Thy light, and so to be led by Thee that in all the circumstances of life we may recognize Thy goodness to us, Thy helpfulness in times of difficulty, and leading us always into a larger place of fellowship, one with another, in the high responsibilities of life and with Thyself. We ask in Christ Jesus' name. Amen.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PUBLICATIONS OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed report giving the aggregate number of various publications issued during the fiscal year 1921, and also the cost of the paper used for such publications, cost of

SALES OF CONDEMNED PROPERTY BY SERGEANT AT ARMS.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2108) prohibiting the interment of the body of any person in the cemetery known as the Cemetery of White's Tabernacle, No. 39, of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8744) granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 38) extending the time for the completion of investigation and filing of report by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry to not later than the 15th of April, 1922, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 6380. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended; and

H. R. 7601. An act to amend an act incorporating Prospect Hill Cemetery, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference requested by the Senate, and that Mr. MADDEN, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 3250) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to Augustus S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

SENATOR LODGE'S ADDRESS AND THE FOUR-POWER TREATY (S. DOC. NO. 101).

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in the ordinary 8-point type and also printed as a public document the address of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on the four-power treaty before the Conference on Limitation of Armament, together with a copy of the treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts and member of the American delegation at the Conference on the Limitation of Armament, spoke as follows, December 10, 1921, at the fourth plenary session of the conference:

"I should be insensible, indeed, if I did not feel deeply gratified by the opportunity which has come to me to lay before the conference the draft of a treaty, the terms of which have been agreed upon by four of the great powers of the earth in regard to the islands of the Pacific, which they control, either as possessions or dominions. I will begin by reading to the conference the treaty, which is both brief and simple, and yet I am sure is full of meaning and importance to the world's peace.

"'The United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan—

"'With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean—

"'Have determined to conclude a treaty to this effect and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

"'The President of the United States of America,

"'His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India,

"'And for the Domonion of Canada,

"'For the Commonwealth of Australia,

"'For the Dominion of New Zealand,

"'For India,

"'The President of the French Republic,

"'His Majesty the Emperor of Japan,

"'Who having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

"'I.

"'The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

"'If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

"'II.

"'If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

"'III.

"'This agreement shall remain in force for 10 years from the time it shall take effect, and after the expiration of said period it shall continue to be in force subject to the right of any of the high contracting parties to terminate it upon 12 months' notice.

"'IV.

"'This agreement shall be ratified as soon as possible in accordance with the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties and shall take effect on the deposit of ratifications, which shall take place at Washington, and thereupon the agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate.'

"The signing of this treaty is, on the part of the United States, subject to the making of a convention with Japan concerning the status of the island of Yap and what tre termed 'the mandated islands' in the Pacific Ocean north of the Equator, the negotiations in regard to which are almost concluded, and also to the reservations with respect to what are termed 'the mandated islands' in the Pacific Ocean south of the Equator.

"It should also be observed that the controversies to which the proposed treaty refers do not embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

"The conference will perceive that I spoke correctly when I referred to the terms of the treaty as simple. To put it in a few words, the treaty provides that the four signatory powers will agree as between themselves to respect their insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific, and that if any controversy should arise as to such rights all the high contracting parties shall be invited to a joint conference looking to the adjustment of such controversy. They agree to take similar action in the case of aggression by any other power upon these insular possessions or dominions. The agreement is to remain in force for 10 years, and after ratification under the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties the existing agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate. And that is all. Each signer is bound to respect the rights of the others, and before taking action in any controversy to consult with them. There is no provision for the use of force to carry out any of the terms of the agreement, and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses.

"The surest way to prevent war is to remove the causes of war. This is an attempt to remove causes of war over a great area of the globe's surface by reliance upon the good faith and honest intentions of the nations which sign the treaty, solving all differences through the processes of diplomacy and joint consideration and conciliation. No doubt we shall hear it said that the region to which this agreement applies is one most unlikely to give birth to serious disputes, and therefore an agreement of this character is of little consequence. History unhappily has shown that there is no corner of the earth so remote or so valueless that it is not capable of giving cause for controversy or even for war between the tribes and the nations of mankind. But the islands of the Pacific, although remote from the dwelling places of the mass of humanity, are far from valueless.

"The islands of the southwestern Pacific extend over a vast space in that great ocean. They reach from the Marquesas on the east to the Philippines on the west; from the Aleutian Islands on the north nearly to the Antarctic Circle on the south. They are far more numerous than is generally realized. I do not know what the total number is, but I am informed as to the Philippines, and it appears that this group alone contains over 3,100 islands, of which 1,600 have names. We have all probably heard of the remark of Robert Louis Stevenson, when on leaving one of the Pacific Islands he was asked how he was going to Samoa. He replied that he should just go out and turn to the left. These islands are, comparatively speaking, so dense that we might describe them in the words of Browning as the—

Sprinkled isles.
Lily on lily that o'erlace the sea—

"And yet the region through which they are scattered is so vast that the isles of Greece and the Aegean Sea, so famous in history and in poetry, could easily be lost therein and continue unnoticed except by wandering seamen or stray adventurers. They range from Australia, continental in magnitude, to atolls where there are no dwellers but the builders of the coral reefs, or lonely rocks marking the peaks of mountains which rise up from the ocean's floor through miles of water before they touch the air. To the western and eastern world alike most of the islands of the southwestern Pacific are little known. There still lingers about them the charm so compelling and so fascinating which an undiscovered country has for the sons of men who are weary of main-traveled roads and the trampled highways of trade and commerce which cover the surface of the present earth.

"Upon these islands still shines the glamor of romance in the stories of Melville and the writings of Robert Louis Stevenson, to whom the South Seas gave both a grave and a monument imperishable as his own fame. But the Pacific islands are much more than this. They possess certain qualities other than natural beauty and romantic charm, which to many minds are more enticing. The larger ones are rich in many ways, fertile in the gifts of soil and climate and in other forms of riches desired by men, which extend from the untold mineral resources of Australia to the pearls which are brought from the depths of the ocean. There are among them all great areas of forest and of plain fit for the support and prosperity of civilized man. In a word, they have a very great material value, largely undeveloped; and where this condition exists the desires of men will enter, and conflicting human desires have throughout recorded history been breeders of war.

"Thus far the wastes of the Pacific Ocean, with all the crowding islands, except on the edges of the continents, have not been the scene of great wars; and yet not many years have passed since three great nations sent their warships to Samoa because there was a dispute in regard to those distant islands. Therefore, an agreement among the nations controlling these islands has a very serious importance to the peace of the world. We make the experiment here in this treaty of trying to assure peace in that immense region by trusting the preservation of its tranquillity to the good faith of the nations responsible for it. The world has just passed through a war the very memory of which makes us shudder. We all believe deep in our hearts that this hideous destruction of life, this suffering and ruin which still beset us, must not be permitted to come again if we can prevent it.

"If the nations of the earth are still in the innermost recesses of their consciousness planning or dreaming of coming wars and longing for conquests, no treaties of partition and no alliances can stay them; but if, as I firmly hope, the world has learned a frightful lesson from the awful experiences of the Great War of 1914, then our surest appeal in order to prevent wars in the future must be to the hearts, the sympathies, the reason, and the higher impulses of mankind. Such an appeal we make today by this agreement among four great nations. We rely upon their good faith to carry out the terms of this instrument, knowing that by so doing they will prevent war should controversies ever arise among them. If this spirit prevails and rules we can have no better support than the faith of nations. For one I devoutly believe the spirit of the world is such that we can trust to the good faith and the high purposes which the treaty I have laid before you embodies and enshrines.

"Agreements of this kind, I know, have often been made before, only to fail. But there has been a far-reaching change in the mental condition of men and women everywhere. That which really counts is the intention of the nations who make the agreement. In this hour of trial and darkness which has followed the war with Germany the spirit of the world is no longer the same. If we enter upon this agreement, which rests only upon the will and honor of those who sign it, we at least make the great experiment and appeal to the men and women of the nations to help us sustain it in spirit and in truth."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented 60 petitions of sundry citizens of Pacosco, Black Diamond, Seattle, Ravensdale, Issaquah, Tukwila, Benton City, Kennydale, Bellingham, Ferndale, Everson, Olympia, Puyallup, Sumner, Orting, Harstine Island, Detroit, Ballow, Allyn, Manette, Carbonado, Nooksack, Blaine, Lawrence, Ronald, Marysville, Arlington, Twisp, East Stanwood, Bryant, Dominion, Auburn, Hoquiam, Tacoma, Winthrop, Okanogan, Mazama, Starbuck, Addy, Orin, Hillyard, Coupeville, Port Angeles, Elwha, Spokane, Maple Valley, Prosser, Grandview, Colville, Meyers Falls, Marcus, Joyce, Eden, Gettysburg, Washougal, Camas, Vancouver, Everett, Snohomish, Renton, Monahan, Doty, Dryad, Littell, Bay View, Mount Vernon, Lyman, Enumclaw, Waterman, Big Lake, Wickersham, Acme, Clipper, Lynden, Chisville, Custer, West Lake, Kettle Falls, Glenwood, Laurel, Toppenish, Tracyton, Bremerton, Ridgefield, Gertrude, Meridian, Camden, Elk, Scotia, Anacortes, Burlington, Goldbar, Sultan, all in the State of Washington, praying for the repeal of the espionage act and all war-time legislation, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LADD presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Grand Forks and University, N. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 2135, to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a communication in the nature of a petition from Henry W. Nevinson, correspondent to the Manchester (England) Guardian, relative to the granting of amnesty to prisoners who have been sentenced on account of violation of war-time laws, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FOREIGNER'S PETITION.

Coming as I do from England as a stranger among the American people, I certainly have no wish to interfere in their domestic or political affairs, but there are some things that appeal to one in the name of justice and humanity quite apart from national rights or citizenship.

In spite of all my genuine admiration for American life and manners, one discovery fills me with astonishment and regret. I am informed that the American Government still holds some 145 persons in prison on account of supposed offenses committed under the so-called espionage act and other special laws enacted during the late war, which has now in reality been terminated for three years.

Many of these prisoners are serving terms of 10 or even 20 years merely, as I understand, for the expression of their opinions, chiefly or entirely in opposition to war. They come of all classes, but most are workingmen, naturally engaged in mining, lumber, and agriculture, so that the whole Nation loses by their imprisonment. And they themselves, being removed from wholesome employment, are likely to degenerate as men do in jail. The longer they are imprisoned the less useful they will become.

The right of free speech may perhaps be restricted of necessity in war time. But such restrictions are among the most pernicious curses of war, and it is the duty of every nation to remove them with all speed the moment that peace is concluded. In my own country all offenders under this head have long been released; I think within a month or two of the armistice. The same is true, I believe, of all other countries except the one country which I was brought up to regard as the very land of freedom. One of the most peculiar circumstances in the case is that the espionage act itself, so I am told, was suspended last March, and these political offenders continue imprisoned under a law which no longer exists.

I speak as one who has spent a long and varied life mainly in advocating personal freedom and contending with all his might against oppression and injustice wherever he has found them. Those long efforts and my profound regret at finding this oppression and injustice still possible in a Nation which I so greatly honor are my sole reasons for joining in this appeal to the President or Congress of the United States for a general amnesty in regard to these supposed breaches of an obsolete law.

The present occasion appears particularly suitable for this amnesty since, during this conference in Washington, such speeches denouncing war and extolling peace have been made by many statesmen of the highest position in their various countries as would probably have consigned them also to jail if they had been made only four years ago.

HENRY W. NEVINSON,
Correspondent to the Manchester Guardian.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. TOWNSEND (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented three resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Menominee; the Home Fortnightly Club, of Calumet; and the Union Literary Club, of Big Rapids; all in the State of Michigan, favoring the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway for ocean-going vessels, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a resolution adopted by the American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic, of Detroit, Mich., commending the President for calling the Conference on Limitation of Armament, favoring open sessions of said conference, and requesting that action be taken to prevent further military aggression by Great Britain against the Irish republic, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Escanaba (Mich.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the enactment of the so-called French-Capper truth in fabric bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 28) to provide for appropriate military records for persons who, pursuant to orders, reported for military duty, but whose induction or commission into the service was not, through no fault of their own, formally completed on or prior to November 11, 1918, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 356) thereon.

CLAIMS BEFORE ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2780) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks for the immediate consideration of a bill, which the Secretary will report.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out the words "six months" in such section and inserting in lieu thereof "18 months."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to state that the object of the bill is to extend from 6 months to 18 months the time in which to bring suits against the Alien Property Custodian for property taken by him. The time limit of six months has nearly expired, and if any relief is to be given it ought to be given now.

The bill was referred to the Department of Justice, and I have a letter from the Attorney General recommending the passage of the bill. I also have a letter from the Alien Property Custodian.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read. Does the Senator desire to have the bill read again?

Mr. KING. Let it be read again. It is very brief.

The Assistant Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. NELSON. I just stated it a moment ago. The object of the bill is to extend the time for bringing suits against the Alien Property Custodian on claims growing out of property which he seized. The six months' time limit under the existing law is now about to expire. It expires, I think, the 1st of January.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is, the time for bringing suits against the Government or against the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. NELSON. Against either of them for property taken by the Alien Property Custodian. The bill is for the purpose of extending that time for 18 months, and it is recommended by the Alien Property Custodian and by the Department of Justice. Assistant Attorney General Goff of that department has been assigned to the duty of looking after all matters pertaining to the Alien Property Custodian, and I have a letter from him recommending the bill. It is a very short letter, so I shall read it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does he give the reasons upon which he bases his request that the time for suing the Government shall be extended?

Mr. NELSON. I will read the letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1921.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Chairman Senate Judiciary Committee, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR NELSON: Senate bill 2780, providing that section 9 of the trading with the enemy act be amended by striking out the words "6 months" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "18 months," has been referred to this department for its suggestion. The effect of this change is to extend the time for bringing suit under this act.

I take pleasure in advising you that it will be most acceptable to the department to have this bill passed. The change suggested is very necessary. The department heartily indorses the bill and trusts that its immediate passage will follow.

Thanking you very much, I am,

Yours, very sincerely,

GUY D. GOFF,
Acting Attorney General.

I also have a letter from the Alien Property Custodian in favor of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Washington for just a moment, I will state that I prepared and introduced the bill some time ago for this reason. As the Senator knows, a large amount of property owned by perhaps several hundred thousand people was seized by the Alien Property Custodian under authority granted by Congress.

Much of that property, under laws which we have subsequently passed, should be returned, but the proof of citizenship and the necessary steps to be taken involve so much time that it will be absolutely impossible within the time limit fixed by law for the property to be restored.

In order to avoid putting them to the necessity of going into court, it was deemed wise to extend the time within which they might sue in order that the Alien Property Custodian might make ample investigation and restore the property without compelling them to go into court. It is in the interest of justice, in the interest of American citizens whose property has been seized, as well as in the interest of the nationals of countries other than those who were belligerents in the recent war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The purpose stated by the Alien Property Custodian in his letter, which I have just examined, is to give the Alien Property Custodian a longer time in which to consider the claims which have been presented. It is rather for his relief than for that of the claimants. I have no objection to the bill. I think it is a very good measure.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the letter of the Alien Property Custodian be printed in the RECORD in connection with the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1921.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Chairman Senate Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR NELSON: The attention of this office has been called to Senate bill 2780 introduced by Senator KING of Utah, which, if enacted into law, will extend the time in which suits may be brought under the trading with the enemy act.

By the peace proclamation, the termination of the war dates from July 2, 1921, and therefore, January 2, 1922, is the last date within which suit can be brought under the statutes for the recovery of property when the claim has been disallowed by this office and the Department of Justice. Because of the great number of claims now pending in this office, the time is inadequate to properly consider them for allowance or disallowance, and, therefore, those claimants whose claims might be disallowed would not have time to institute suit by January 2, 1922.

For the reason set forth above, I take pleasure in advising you that this proposed legislation is acceptable to this office, and its early passage will enable us to solve the difficulties that have arisen because of the conditions outlined above.

Respectfully, yours,

THOMAS W. MILLER,
Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is detained from the Chamber by illness in his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] are detained from the Senate in attendance upon a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

I also desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] on business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators and Mr. EDGE and Mr. REED answered to their names when called.

Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. STERLING, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. BURSUM, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. MCLEAN, and Mr. ELKINS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

ISSUANCE OF CHECKS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia, which were on page 1, line 10, strike out "imprisoned" and insert "guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment"; on page 2, lines 5 and 6, strike out "upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order" and insert "the amount due thereon"; and on page 2, line 7, after "any" to insert "within five days after receiving notice in person, or writing, that such draft, or order, has not been paid."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia asked me to move to concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives. I can explain the amendments in just a moment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if this is a bill with respect to the issuing of checks?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is.

Mr. KING. Has the bill been considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. It is Senate bill No. 1033 and is entitled "A bill regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia. I do not know whether or not it is the bill the Senator has in mind.

Mr. KING. I did not know that it had been considered by the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It has been so considered.

Mr. KING. I had supposed that such a bill would be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill passed the Senate on June 10 last.

Mr. KING. I was not aware of that. I should like the Senator to allow the bill and amendments of the House of Representatives to lie over until I have a chance to examine them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can explain the amendments of the House of Representatives in just a moment, and then the Senator may realize that the amendments of the House really supplement what the Senate had in mind and make the bill a better one.

The bill as passed by the Senate reads:

That any person within the District of Columbia who, with intent to defraud, shall make, draw, utter, or deliver any check, draft, or order for the payment of money upon any bank or other depository * * * shall be imprisoned for not more than one year.

The House struck out the word "imprisoned" and inserted the words "guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment." I think that is much better language and expresses better the intent of the act than the language of the bill as passed by the Senate.

Then, beginning in line 5, on page 2, the Senate bill reads:

Provided such maker or drawer shall not have paid the holder thereof, upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order.

The House strikes the language out beginning with the words "upon demand" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "the amount due thereon," but the next amendment practically covers the part stricken out, for on page 2, line 7, after the words "the amount due thereon, together with the amount of protest fees, if any," the House has inserted an amendment reading "within five days after receiving notice in person, or writing, that such draft or order has not been paid."

The amendments of the House meet substantially the intention of the Senate, and are probably expressed in somewhat better language.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator what is the maximum punishment in case the amendments suggested be adopted?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill provides in the case of conviction imprisonment for not more than one year or a fine of not more than $1,000, or both. That language was adopted both by the Senate and the House; there has been no change in that at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether such punishment would be inflicted upon a person who, with intent to defraud, might draw a check for 10 cents or $1, whereas if he had stolen such an amount it would be only petty larceny and would subject him only to the penalty that is provided for a misdemeanor?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There seems to be no limit, one way or the other, as to the size of the check or draft. The language as passed by the Senate in that respect has also been adopted in the House; so that it is merely a question as to concurrence in the amendments of the House, which, of course, are substantially the same as the provisions of the Senate bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course, I appreciate the parliamentary situation of this bill. If I had been present when the bill was under consideration, I would have moved certain amendments. I am opposed to the bill in its present form, as I have hastily read it. As I said a moment ago, I do not think it is fair to subject an individual who draws a check for 10 cents or $1, for the purpose of defrauding, to the same punishment as that meted out to a man who draws a check for $1,000 or $10,000 with a like purpose. If we distinguish between grand and petty larceny, it would seem to me that there ought to be some differentiation between the act which sought to defraud of 10 cents and the act which contemplated defrauding of $10,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me suggest to the Senator that this bill leaves it in the discretion of the court. The court can fine a man $1 if he desires to do so, and I take it that the circumstances the Senator has related would appeal to the sound discretion of the court in fixing the penalty. The bill reads, as the Senator will note:

For not more than one year, or be fined not more than $1,000, or both.

In other words, the court could fine the man 10 cents and let him go.

Mr. KING. Yet the Senator knows that with respect to larceny or embezzlement there is a maximum fixed for the amount under $50 usually—that is, six months in the penitentiary and a fine not to exceed $300. That is the penalty in nearly every State of the Union; whereas in grand larceny, where the amount purloined is in excess of $50, the minimum punishment is one year in the penitentiary and $500 or $1,000 fine, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, that differs in the different States; but that, of course, is not, as the Senator realizes, the situation in controversy here. The bill has passed the Senate. It has passed the House with these minor amendments that really make the language of the Senate bill more clearly express what was intended.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the more we talk about mercy and charity and civilization the harsher penalties we prescribe. I do not believe in these harsh penalties which we so often enact; and I think the penalty of $1,000 fine and a year in the penitentiary which may be inflicted by the court for the fraudulent procurement of a dollar or other insignificant sum is too great.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not conceive that the court would impose a penalty of that kind under the circumstances related by the Senator; and this bill allows the court to make the punishment just as light as he feels that the circumstances warrant. It does seem to me we could safely trust the court in cases of that kind; but, of course, that is my opinion, and the Senator has a different view of the matter.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator as to another matter? I have not the bill before me, but I hastily read the words that certain things would be prima facie evidence. I do not like any bill that makes any act criminal in character and makes certain things prima facie evidence.

Mr. JONES of Washington This bill reads in this way—I have not examined the bill with that in view, because I simply had in charge the matter of these amendments:

As against the maker or drawer thereof the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering by such maker or drawer of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee because of insufficient funds of the maker or drawer in its possession or control, shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository, provided such maker or drawer shall not have paid the holder thereof upon demand, in person or in writing—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. Now you amend that by inserting "within five days?"

Mr. JONES of Washington. We amend that in this way: In line 5 we strike out the words "upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order," and put in lieu of that the words "the amount due thereon," and then it reads in this way:

The holder thereof the amount due thereon, together with the amount of protest fees, if any.

And then this amendment follows, which really takes care of the language stricken out:

Within five days after receiving notice in person or writing that such draft or order has not been paid.

Mr. KING. Of course this looks like a bill to enforce a civil liability by the threat of criminal prosecution. The act of criminality seems to be eliminated if you make payment.

The intent is all right if you make payment; so that the act might have been criminal, but if you make payment you are absolved. In other words, you use the threat that this shall be prima facie evidence of fraud unless within five days you make payment. It is at variance with every conception of criminal law. The crime was committed if there was a fraudulent intent; and it seems to me that you can not whitewash the intent and eliminate it by saying, "Well, if you make payment within five days, then there was no intent, and you are exonerated."

I do not believe that the legislation is wise, and it seems to me it is not fashioned along just and rational lines. Of course,

I appreciate that it can not be amended. We must take the bill as it is or reject it as it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a statement?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. This seems to be an express effort to use the machinery of the criminal courts to collect a debt, contrary to criminal procedure in most of the States.

Mr. KING. That is what I was trying to say, but the Senator has said it better than I could.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator from Utah. No one could say anything better than he.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in most civilized countries if a man were to commit a crime by getting money through false pretenses or otherwise and the person injured were to threaten the individual with prosecution in order to compel him to pay that money, he would be himself guilty of a crime, and the prosecuting attorney who would threaten to employ the criminal processes for the purpose of compelling a man to pay a civil debt would himself be guilty of usurpation and of being a party to extortion, and would be liable to punishment.

This act, if it were properly entitled, would be entitled "An act to authorize the use of the criminal processes for the purpose of compelling the payment of a civil debt." To my mind it is utterly monstrous, and will set an example that will be exceedingly injurious, both in its moral effect and in every other way.

Following the analysis of the Senator from Utah, the bill amounts to this: It declares that any person who shall utter a check without having funds in the bank sufficient to meet it shall be guilty of a crime.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to suggest there that the language of the bill is "with intent to defraud"?

Mr. REED. Very well. That makes it worse. It provides, then, that whoever, with the intent to defraud, shall utter a check without having funds in the bank sufficient to meet it, shall be punished, provided, however, that at any time within five days he can go around and pay the amount of that check, and his criminal intent and his criminal act cease to exist.

Under this bill a man could go down to one of our banks with the deliberate purpose of fraud formed in his heart and pass a check for $100,000, or he could go into a business transaction and pass a check for $100,000, and get the money in his pocket and not have a dollar in that bank, and know that he did not have a dollar in the bank on which the check was drawn. If he can run away and get away with the money, all right; he has escaped. If they catch him, he can give the money back and go unwhipped of justice. Such a law as that, Mr. President, is a disgrace to the statutes of any civilized country.

There are other objections to this bill. The language of it is that—

> As against the maker or drawer thereof the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering by such maker or drawer of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee because of insufficient funds of the maker or drawer in its possession or control, shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository.

That language is very loose and ought not to be in the statute.

The refusal of a bank to pay a check on the ground that there are not sufficient funds never ought to create a prima facie case against any man, because frequently banks refuse payment upon the ground that there are not sufficient funds when there are sufficient funds, and it has happened tens of thousands of times through the fault of the bank; yet the refusal, because there are not sufficient funds, under this bill, would create a prima facie case against a man who might have the money in the bank. Moreover, a man might believe that he had money in the bank, and in the very best of faith draw his check—it has happened, I presume, to every man in this Senate Chamber at some time in his life—and the mere fact that he made a mistake ought to create no prima facie case against him. The question as to whether he knew or did not know ought to be a question of fact, to be proven as other questions of fact are proven, by substantive evidence.

I do not want to take time to argue this matter, but just to illustrate for a moment: Here is a man who, in the long course of business, is giving out checks. He is noticing his bank balance. Somebody has a check that he may for a year or two years or three years let lie around in his desk without depositing it. It happens frequently. It has happened to me. I have done it myself. That check goes in two or three years late. The man who has the money in the bank has forgotten all about the check, and has noticed his bank balance, and he apparently has plenty of money there. The old check some day appears in the bank, and the money is checked out on it, and when a new check comes in there is no money there to meet it, or not sufficient funds. Mistakes of this kind are of daily occurrence.

I was talking only yesterday with a man engaged extensively in the cattle business, and he told me this story: That in a certain community of foreigners he had bought cattle in very large numbers for many years; that they insisted upon having his checks in hundred-dollar amounts; and although the deal might involve many thousands of dollars, he had to make hundred-dollar checks. He did not know the reason for it at the time, but afterwards discovered that these foreign people put the checks away in their homes and held them, and that some of them were not cashed for three or four years; that in the meantime, while his book showed his bank account was exhausted, the bank's books showed that he had thousands of dollars to his credit.

This sort of legislation is wholly unnecessary. There are plenty of laws on the statute books now providing that if any man draws a check with a fraudulent purpose, and does not have funds in the bank, he can be punished. It is a common-law crime to obtain money or credit in that way, and all that is necessary is the proof that a man gave a check under such circumstances as to indicate his fraudulent intent, and from that the intent can be inferred.

I go back to the first proposition I discussed. To put upon the statute books the bald proposition that a man may conceive a fraud, may execute his fraud, may obtain the proceeds of his fraud, and then, if he pays the money back, the criminal process shall cease, is a monstrous and unthinkable thing in criminal jurisprudence.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language of the proposed statute, if the Senator from Missouri will permit, makes it even worse than that, because the prima facie presumption of fraud does not attach, however the actual fraud may have occurred, if the party guilty of the fraud subsequently pays the amount of the check to the holder of it. It is vicious in every aspect, I agree with the Senator from Missouri, and is contrary to the laws of almost every State in the Union, to provide that if one practices a fraud he may be relieved from the penalty for it by making reimbursement to the party upon whom the fraud has been practiced. It is nothing more than writing into the law a provision that the criminal statutes and criminal processes may be used to enforce the collection of a debt.

Mr. REED. It is as bad as to say that if a man steals a horse and afterwards returns the horse when he is detected in his theft he shall not be prosecuted for horse stealing.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the presumption shall not arise that he intended to steal it.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from Washington, who has this matter in charge, to let it go over until to-morrow. The parliamentary situation is such that I am unable to perceive how we are going to extricate ourselves from this cul de sac if we reach the conclusion that this legislation is subject to the criticism which has been made. I understand the bill was passed by the Senate, it went to the House, and they have passed it with sundry amendments. Obviously we must agree to those amendments or send the bill to conference, and if it goes to conference, then the conferees could deal only with those amendments, and the amendments do not reach the point to which attention has been called. I beg the Senator to let it go over until to-morrow, to see if some plan may not be devised by which these evils in the bill may be corrected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have no objection to the matter going over. I must say that I can see no force whatever in the objections made by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Missouri. The cases cited by the Senator from Missouri could be met under the bill as it passed. I shall not argue the merits of the measure. I think a mere reading of the bill will show there is no danger of any hardships being worked under it. If a man draws a check, knowing that he has no money in the bank, with the intent to defraud somebody, why should we be so solicitous about him? He is protected to this extent: The act provides that while the drawing of the check, when he knew he had no funds in the bank, is prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud, if upon notice in writing or in person he pays it in five days, that ends it. I am not sure, but I think we have a law in our State somewhat like that, and I think there are other States which have laws of that kind. I can not see that it would work hardship upon any honest man. I can see loopholes, even, for dishonest men to avoid the consequences of their dishonest intent.

But, as the Senator has said, the amendments the House has made are the only matters at issue here. If the bill were sent to conference, the matters to which objection has been made, as the Senator from Utah has said, would not be subject to conference, and would not be corrected even if they should be corrected. I do not think there can be any reasonable objection to the amendments made by the House, but I am willing, at the request of the Senator from Utah, to let the matter go over until to-morrow rather than ask that it be disposed of in the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL].

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator whether the whole matter is not one for State action?

Mr. JONES of Washington. This relates to the District of Columbia.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not understand that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the matter lie on the table until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill and the amendments of the House will lie on the table. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

REVENUES FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 205) relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Washington, who has been very courteous in not pressing this measure, that I shall not object to its consideration, except to say that I do not think we can fully consider it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If we take it up by motion, then we would not be limited by the five-minute rule. That is my understanding.

Mr. KING. I shall not interpose any obstacle to the Senator pursuing such course as he may regard as proper.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator asks that the bill shall go over, I will move that we take the bill up notwithstanding his objection. Then, I understand, the Senator would have more than five minutes in which to discuss the bill.

Mr. KING. I may not want to talk for five minutes, but for the purpose of having further time than five minutes I suggest that the bill go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 205.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the general expenses of the District of Columbia shall be chargeable to and paid out of the Treasury of the United States and the revenues of said District in the proportion of 50 per cent from the Treasury of the United States and 50 per cent from the revenues of the said District.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to advance, on the requisition of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, made in the manner prescribed by law, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary from time to time to meet the general expenses of said District, as authorized by Congress, and to reimburse the Treasury for the portion of said advances payable by the District of Columbia out of the taxes and revenues collected for the support of the government thereof. If in any year the taxes and revenues of the District of Columbia shall be insufficient to reimburse the Treasury for the portion of said advance payable by the District of Columbia, such unpaid advance shall be reimbursed to said Treasury out of the revenues of the District of Columbia of the succeeding year or years. If in any year the taxes and revenues of the District of Columbia shall be more than sufficient to reimburse the Treasury for the portion of said advances payable by the District of Columbia, such surplus of revenue and all unexpended or unappropriated surpluses of the District revenue shown by the reports of said commissioners to have been heretofore accumulated and deposited in the Treasury of the United States shall be held in the Treasury as a trust fund for the benefit of said District and available as revenue of the District of Columbia for meeting the portion of appropriations payable by said District in the succeeding year or years.

SEC. 3. That the per cent of approved estimates to be levied and assessed under the act of June 11, 1878, upon the taxable property and privileges in said District shall be raised by the imposition of such rate of taxation on realty and tangible personal property as the commissioners shall ascertain to be necessary to raise annually, in combination with other District tax revenues and unexpended tax surpluses of previous years, a sum sufficient to meet the proportion of expenses to be paid by the District of Columbia under existing law: Provided, however, That such rate of taxation shall in no event be less than 1½ per cent.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Washington a question. There is one thing which strikes me in the reading of the bill, that in the provision relating to personal property it is limited to tangible property. Credits are immune from taxation under it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It repeats the law just as it is now. We do not attempt to change the tax law.

Mr. NELSON. The bill provides for the levy of taxes on real estate and tangible personal property.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is as the law is now.

Mr. NELSON. But it does not provide for the levy of taxes on other personal property. Does not the Senator know that the District of Columbia is a sort of a paradise for wealthy men, who come here to get immunity from taxation on credits?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We do not attempt to affect the law with reference to taxation at all. We have not attempted to deal with that. We have left that just as Congress has left it, and we use the language which is in the law now. Of course, if the Senator desires to amend the tax law, that should be done, I think, in a separate measure.

Mr. NELSON. Why should we limit taxation, as is done in this bill, to realty and tangible personal property?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We do not limit it in this bill; it is limited by law. We merely reaffirm here the language of the law as it is now, with reference to taxation, and the only difference we make is that we do provide that the rate of taxation shall in no event be less than 1½ per cent. That is what it is now. We did not desire to lower the rate of taxation, so we provided that it should not be lower than that rate.

Mr. LENROOT. Nearly every State has now enacted State income tax laws. The District of Columbia has no such law. If it had such a law, a very large revenue would be obtained from that source. If we had such a law, as nearly every State now has, would the Senator still be in favor of a 50-50 proposition?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The people here do pay income taxes, the same as they do in the States.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no. Each individual in a State pays a Federal income tax and then pays a State income tax.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He does where the State has provided for it.

Mr. LENROOT. Most of the States have provided for it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know about that statement. I do not think they have provided for a State income tax in my State, and I think there are many States which have not provided for income taxes.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be a strong statement of mine, but most of the Eastern States have an income tax law. New York has and Wisconsin has.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Even under that condition, I can not see any reason why we should change the rate. I think the 50–50 plan would still be fair.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, does the Senator think that by a proper, reasonable means of taxation we should accumulate a very large sum which can not properly be used for municipal expenses?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. LENROOT. Assuming that a very large sum would be raised through that means and assuming, further, that the rate fixed in the bill is only a reasonable rate, does the Senator think we should raise money that we do not need for municipal purposes and that the Federal Government should appropriate money that is not necessary for municipal purposes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; we probably would have to change the rate then. If we impose a rate upon citizens here on personal property that takes from their incomes a large amount of money, there is no reason why it is not fair to them that the rate on the real estate should be made lower, but I believe that a contribution by the citizens of the District of 50 per cent of the taxation necessary to carry on the affairs of the District is really fair and just.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator think the citizens of the District of Columbia should pay as large a tax proportionately as is paid by the citizens of a State?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know about that. Conditions here are quite different from what they are in the States. There is so much property here that is withdrawn from taxation entirely that it makes a condition which I think is different from that in the States.

Mr. LENROOT. That has nothing to do with my question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me that it has, or else I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose three-fourths of the property were withdrawn, does the Senator say that would affect the question of the amount of taxes which ought to be paid by the individual? Has he any right to complain if he is not paying any more than citizens of the States are paying?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Possibly not. I really do not see how that makes any difference here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I interrupt at this point, in view of the question asked by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not seem to me that we should enact a tax law for the District of Columbia on the theory that a citizen here should pay as much as a citizen of the State of New York, for instance. The citizens here should pay enough to support the District government. The tax should be measured by the cost of the government and not by taxes in any other part of the country. The taxes in one part of the country should not be measured or controlled by what happens to be paid in another part of the country.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think there is much force in that suggestion.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator this question: If the citizens of the District of Columbia enjoy all the privileges and all the benefits so far as taxation can affect those privileges or benefits, does the Senator think this should be a haven for citizens of other States to come to and escape paying their fair share of taxes, and that the Government, all the people of the United States, should contribute for their benefit?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly not, Mr. President. I do not think this should be a haven for anybody trying to evade the payment of taxes.

Mr. LENROOT. It is suggested by the Senator from New York that it is not a fair measure of taxation to compare it with what other citizens pay. It must be remembered in this proposition that all the people of the United States are to contribute 50 per cent of the expenses of keeping up this municipal government irrespective of whether the citizens of the District are called upon to pay a fair share or not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is irrespective of that. It is on the theory that that is a fair share. That is the theory on which this is based. This question has been investigated many times. I have not gone into the details of the matter as fully as I would if it had never been investigated, but it has been investigated especially of late years by a special committee created by Congress to look into that very proposition, and that committee took hundreds, and possibly thousands, of pages of testimony. I have the two volumes here before me now in which they submit the testimony that they took, together with their report, and they came to the conclusion that the people here should pay a reasonable rate of taxation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Washington that they absolutely recommended that the rate of fifty-fifty be abolished.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator can not find that anywhere in their recommendations.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was in their recommendation, if the Senator will pardon me. They said possibly that was a fair rate then, but they recommended that the rate be abolished.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But they did that on this theory——

Mr. CARAWAY. I know the theory upon which they did it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That the Government should pay more than 50 per cent.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no. It was on the theory that the people of the District should pay a fair tax, and then whatever the amount lacked of taking care of the expenses of the District of Columbia the Federal Government should pay. The Senator's bill prohibits the taxation of the people of the District of Columbia for more than 50 per cent of the expenses of the government of the District, although that might result in practically exempting wealth from taxation in the District of Columbia. That is the bill which the Senator is championing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill that is presented now is based upon the theory——

Mr. CARAWAY. I know the theory, and that theory makes it absolutely impossible for the Government to require the citizens of the District of Columbia to pay a fair tax provided 50 per cent of the expense is paid by the Federal Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It simply leaves it so that whenever Congress comes to the conclusion that 50–50 is not a fair rate, it can change it. Of course, if Congress has reached that conlusion now it can change it in this bill. I am proceeding on the theory that the 50–50 rate is fair to the Government and fair to the citizens of the District of Columbia now.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is absolutely tying the hands of the Committee on Appropriations when they come to fixing the amount to be contributed by the District and by the Federal Government. It makes every item subject to a point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is not the duty or the business of the Committee on Appropriations to determine that; it is a legislative proposition that Congress ought to lay down by legislation. As I said, if the time is not now, but should arise next year, when the 50–50 rate is not fair, then we should legislate to that effect so that the Committee on Appropriations may be guided by it. It is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations to legislate on this question.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator another question? Why would it not be fair under the present law to let the committee fix the amount necessary to maintain the District government, first applying to it whatever sums may have been raised by a reasonable tax on the property in the District of Columbia, and supplementing that from the general revenue of the country? Why should a man in my State or in the Senator's State be required to pay three times as much tax as a man living in the District of Columbia, in order that we may relieve the man in the District of Columbia?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator should not state it in that way. That is not the purpose of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the effect of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the Senator's opinion; it is not my opinion.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am entitled to whatever opinion I draw from it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly the Senator is, but he has not any right to question my opinion and the integrity of it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not questioning the integrity of the Senator's opinion, but I am saying that is the effect of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the Senator's opinion and I think he is honest in his opinion, but my judgment is the other way.

Mr. CARAWAY. I presume the Senator will give me credit for being honest. I took that for granted or I would not have asked the question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator suggested rather a peculiar thing by the language he used.

Mr. CARAWAY. This is what I said: If Congress is compelled to contribute 50 per cent out of the general revenues of the Government and give to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the right to fix their rate of taxation so that they shall be required to raise only 50 per cent of the taxes, are they not compelled under the Senator's bill to lower the taxes in order that they shall not raise more than 50 per cent? As it is now—and I speak now advisedly, because I know whereof I speak, having paid taxes here and in another jurisdiction as well—the tax in the District of Columbia is not more than 33⅓ per cent of what it is in my State, and we are obliged to pay that high rate there in order to contribute a part of that tax to the expense of the District of Columbia, so that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may lower the rate here. The Senator's bill makes it absolutely imperative that they shall lower it whenever the rate of tax would raise more than necessary to raise the 50 per cent.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the theory of the Senator that the Government should pay half the taxes because the Government occupies a certain territorial part of the District? Is that the theory?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is based largely upon that and the value of its property.

Mr. McNARY. If the Government property were removed from the District, would not the Senator from Washington concede that the other property would not have any value, and that it is the governmental activities and property that give private property here its value?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, this is the capital of the Nation.

Mr. McNARY. It is a charity, the Senator must admit.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it is a charity at all.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator from Washington another question. Out in the great Western States the Government keeps off the tax rolls a large portion of the property. Does the Government come to the aid of the States and pay taxes on that untaxable land owned by the Government?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it ought.

Mr. McNARY. Does it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Government furnishes a lot of money for forest trails that is used really for good-road purposes, and so on, but I do not think it does its duty with reference to those States. I agree with the Senator from Oregon. My State is affected probably worse than the Senator's State, about 20,000,000 acres in it being forest reserve, and there is no hope that it will ever be made subject to taxation.

Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to hear my colleague and neighbor admit that the people of the District of Columbia are receiving fairer treatment than the people living in the public-land States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Almost everybody is receiving fairer treatment than the people in the public-land States, but that does not affect my judgment with reference to determining what I think ought to be done in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McNARY. I believe, and I think any Senator who gives it any thought will concede, that the people of the District of Columbia do not pay half the taxes that the people owning private property in any of the States and municipalities pay. May I offer the further observation that this was a cow pasture before the Government came in with its activities, and it is the Government activities and investments that have given private property its value. I think the people of the District should give the Government a subsidy instead of having their taxes paid by appropriations out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the suggestion with reference to the Federal Government contributing to taxes in States where there are Government lands does not apply, because there the Federal Government has not anything to do with the government of the States. The States pay the expenses of conducting the State governments because they control, direct, and manage the affairs of their governments. Here the Federal Government controls the affairs of the District of Columbia. The Federal Government actually owns in the District of Columbia at least half, if not more than half, of the property in the District in value and pretty nearly in extent and area. That property is not taxed at all. It would be wholly unfair and absolutely unreasonable to expect the taxpayers of the District of Columbia to bear the entire expenses of the Government in the District, which is administered very largely for the benefit of the Federal Government, and for the benefit, protection, and care of its property. I think, beyond any question, a casual glance at the map will show that at least half in value of the property in the District of Columbia is owned by the Federal Government, and the expenses in connection with it, in the way of policing, lighting, heating, pavements, water supply, and other public improvements, are largely incurred for the benefit of the property of the Federal Government. Why should the taxpayers of the District pay the expenses in connection with that? Numerous officials and employees of the Government must live here, and they must have schools, hospitals, and other institutions and facilities required in civilized communities.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question more or less personal. I wish to know what his lovely home on Massachusetts Avenue would be worth if the Government were not conducting its activities here and erecting from time to time its splendid departmental and other buildings?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the Government is not conducting its activities for the benefit of my property or anybody else's property. I can not see really the relevancy of that inquiry, because the question of whether the Government's activities here really have any bearing on the value of property has nothing to do with this matter of determining what proportion of the burden of taking care of the property should be borne by the Government and what proportion should be borne by the taxpayers of the District. I realize, of course, that the improvements made to the property of the Government, beautifying the parks, constructing handsome buildings, tends to make the property attractive and valuable and make Washington a desirable city to live in and has its bearing on the value of other property. Of course, if there were no such activities here, there would be no such city as we have and no property holders and no taxes to trouble anybody, but that does not reach the point of this matter at all. It is beside the question entirely to raise that issue. The question here is whether or not the expenses in connection with the administration of the Government in the District of Columbia shall be borne in due proportion by the Federal Government and the taxpayers of the District.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. In a moment. There is another view, and that is this: In no State are governmental affairs administered by the Federal Government; they are administered by the people through their chosen representatives. If that were true in the District, the taxpayers of the District would not expend the amount of money that is being expended in Washington in the way of public improvements, lights, and pavements, and that sort of thing, which are desirable and absolutely necessary in a great city which is the Capital of the Nation.

I say that the city ought to be kept up properly, but some of the things which are being done here are not absolutely necessary; they are more ornamental than useful, perhaps; yet I make no complaint because of their being done. At the same time, we should not expect the taxpayers of the District of Columbia to pay for the doing of some of those unnecessary things which are being done by the Government within the District.

Mr. CARAWAY. Now, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator. In fact, I have nothing further to say, and I have been trespassing on the time of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if he does not think that he ought to pay as much taxes on his property here as the people of Florida are compelled to pay on their property before he asks the people of Florida to contribute toward the taxes of the District of Columbia?

Mr. FLETCHER. In the first place——

Mr. CARAWAY. That is personal, of course; but inasmuch as that question was injected into the debate it may not be inappropriate. However, I will put it the other way, and say that I should pay as much on my property here as I compel the people at home to pay on their property before I ask them, in addition, to contribute toward relieving me of taxes here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FLETCHER. In the first place, Congress has not anything to say about the amount of taxes which shall be paid in Florida by the people of Florida.

Mr. CARAWAY. But Congress has something to say about what taxes are paid here.

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly. The people of the District have no voice in it.

Mr. CARAWAY. And if we relieve the people here we have got to put the taxes on the people in Florida and in Arkansas.

Mr. FLETCHER. I once figured up about what the proportion of the expenses of the District of Columbia the people of Florida paid, and I think the amount was about 20 cents apiece. They have an interest in the Federal buildings and property here.

Mr. CARAWAY. For each one of them?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; but I have not made any actual calculation recently. It would not be easy to arrive at definite, accurate figures as to any particular State.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator from Florida know how much the Federal Government contributes toward the expenses of the District of Columbia?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not the figures now before me.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is several million dollars.

Mr. KING. It is now about $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. CARAWAY. However, it does not make any difference, if I may be permitted to say it, what Florida pays, whether it is $2 or $2,000,000; do we want to legislate so that the burden of taxation shall fall upon people who do not enjoy any of its benefits? There is not a city in the United States where so many advantages are found as in Washington; there is not a place in the world where taxes are so light as they are here.

I say that whenever the people of the District of Columbia shall pay upon their property taxes equivalent to those paid in other cities in the States of the Union for municipal purposes and improvements, then we should go no further; but there is not any sense, there is not any justice, there is not any excuse on God's earth for saying that a man who owns property here in the District of Columbia and pay practically nothing on it for maintaining it while the people in every other State shall be compelled to contribute to keep it up. Somebody has got to pay it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think if the Senator owns property here he is certainly not in a position to say that he pays practically nothing in the way of taxes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I pay three times as much on my property in my own town of Jonesboro, Ark., according to the value, as I pay on property here in the District of Columbia, and I own property in both places.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the Senator's taxes at home are too high.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then taxes ought not to be made lower here but should be increased. If they are already too high elsewhere, and if the people here in the District of Columbia dodge their taxes, then taxes have got to be increased on the people in my own home town to make up the deficit. That is all that it means.

I know it is said, if the Senator will pardon me, that the Government owns 50 per cent of the area and 50 per cent of the property value in the District of Columbia. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that is foreign to the facts. If we should charge every park and every street in the District of Columbia to the Government and call it Government property, then we should have not one-third of the area within the District of Columbia in Government ownership, although the parks are for the people and not the Government, the streets are for the people and not the Government. Yet it is said that the Government owns one-half of the area, when, as a matter of fact, less than 100 acres in the District of Columbia are actually used for governmental purposes exclusively.

I was on the "town council" in the other House, where I put in two years listening to people telling me that the District of Columbia was overtaxed, and during that time on one occasion I went into that matter and found they were taxed then less than 10 per cent of the average cost of maintaining city governments of like size in other communities.

It is an infamous outrage, if I may be permitted to say it, to require people in the States to pay taxes for the population here. This is an "isle of refuge" for rich people. This bill, if I understand it correctly, strikes out every bit of the taxes on intangible wealth and absolutely makes Washington a place where a man who wants to dodge taxes in the States can take up a fictitious residence here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Arkansas is mistaken in that. The bill does not do that at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. I may be mistaken in that, but the Supreme Court will have to pass on it before I shall yield it.

I remember the incident of a man who lived in Battle Creek, Mich. He was a manufacturer of one of these sawdust breakfast foods and grew rich in that industry. When he died, to everyones' astonishment, it was found that he was a resident of the District of Columbia, although he never lived here a day in his life. All he had here was a lot of second-hand furniture stored in somebody's garage. He escaped the inheritance tax, the estate taxes, and all those burdens that would have been incident to a man who lived in Michigan. He acquired his wealth in Michigan, but by a fictitious residence in the District of Columbia he escaped hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of taxes. That is not an unusual case.

I know of a man here who, under the old law, mortgaged the furniture in his residence on Massachusetts Avenue for $40,000 and then took a string of race horses and went to France. Of course, his taxes were reduced by $40,000 by the fictitious mortgage that went on the records of the Recorder of Deeds. He mortgaged his household furniture when he was worth a million dollars. The reports in connection with these matters are very interesting.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, such incidental cases do not bear on the question now before us; they are quite beside the subject. I do not understand that this bill changes the principle of taxation or the kind of property to be taxed at all, but I will say this——

Mr. CARAWAY. Then the Senator has not read the bill, because that is exactly what it does.

Mr. FLETCHER. I only want to mention the fact that, so far as taxes are concerned, I pay some taxes in the District of Columbia, not to any large amount, and I do not know what the rate of tax is; I get my bills and I send my check for the amount. I have observed, however, that the taxes which I paid this year are very much higher than those paid by me last year. As to the exact rate, I do not recall; I have never looked into that matter particularly, but I do know that taxes this year are very much higher than they were last year. So the rate must have been increased, or the valuation increased; I do not know which, but I think the rate has been increased within the last year very materially, I should say 30 to 40 per cent, and quite as much as the taxes have been increased generally over the country.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the language of the bill with reference to taxation, and I should like the attention of the Senator from Arkansas. Here is the language of the bill:

SEC. 3. That the per cent of approved estimates to be levied and assessed under the act of June 11, 1878, upon the taxable property and privileges in said District shall be raised by the imposition of such rate of taxation on realty and tangible personal property as the commissioners shall ascertain to be necessary to raise annually.

That is the law as it is now.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; there is an intangible personal tax in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will show the Senator where that is covered in this bill. I call his attention to the following language:

In combination with other District tax revenues.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir; but the Senator knows that the enumeration of certain items is the exclusion of others. The others will be considered excise taxes pure and simple.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if there is any doubt about that it should be made clear, but what the Senator from Arkansas has suggested was not the intention of the committee. I wish to say to the Senator that this exact language has been carried in at least two appropriation bills under which an intangible tax has been levied. There has never been any question as to the intangible property tax which was provided under an amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] some years ago. Since that time there has been no question about it at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. KING. I can state to the Senator that there are a large number of persons who have established their residences here merely for the purpose of avoiding any intangible taxation. I was told this morning by a Representative from an adjoining State—I shall not mention it—that there are three families, his personal acquaintances, one living in the same apartment house in which he lives, who have moved here and who contend that they pay all of their expenses of living in Washington and make money by having a nominal residence here in Washington, rather than living in their own State and paying the taxes which they escape paying in their own State.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be true in some instances in the case of intangible property.

Mr. KING. I refer to bonds and stocks and moneys and similar property.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Those, of course, would come under the head of intangible property. We adopted an amendment here quite a while ago, after considerable debate and discussion, imposing a tax on intangibles. If that is not an ample tax, then let us make it what it ought to be. We do not in this bill pretend to deal with that subject.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will yield in a moment. The Senate, after long discussion, concluded that it ought not to go further than the provisions of the so-called Sterling amendment. That amendment may not go far enough; that may be true. I am not prepared to say whether it does or does not.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator think that before fixing this arbitrary ratio the committee ought to ascertain whether other sources of taxation ought to be utilized, as they are being utilized in the States, and fair taxes imposed upon the citizens of this District, and then ascertain after that is determined what share the Government ought to pay?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The committee proceeded on the theory that Congress had declared itself with reference to taxation on real property and upon intangibles in the District of Columbia. It was only, I think, two or three years ago when the Sterling amendment was adopted. That was the last expression of Congress. It was an expression made after considerable discussion. So the committee proceeded on the theory that Congress, so far as that is concerned, had gone as far as it thought it ought to go.

The Senator suggested a moment ago privately that this bill ought not to be taken up now; that it would not be considered by the House, and so on. This is one reason that actuates the committee in bringing it out; and it has expressed a desire to me that I should press it for passage largely on this account. We remember that at every session of Congress we have a protracted controversy over the District of Columbia appropriation bill. That measure has been held up until the last days of the session because of the controversy between the Senate and the House with reference to the ratio. As Senators who have been here for some time know, the Senate has often declared itself in favor of the 50-50 plan, and we have adopted it upon two or three appropriation bills. Within the last two or three years we passed a separate bill providing for that ratio; but the District of Columbia appropriation bill, as I have said, has been held up until the last days of the session, and in a short session we have been threatened with a failure to pass it on account of the situation. The committee felt that we ought to try to legislate upon this question and fix it by legislation so that the appropriation bill would not be endangered by reason of such controversies.

Of course, if the Senate think the 50-50 basis is not a fair one, we ought to make it what we think it ought to be; but I do think that we ought to fix it so as to avoid this controversy.

I want to refer for just a moment to the reason for having a definite basis. It was suggested a while ago that we ought to leave it indefinite, and the proposition suggested by the Senator from Arkansas is the proposition that the Senator from Utah has suggested many times—that we ought to impose a fair rate of taxation upon the people in the District and then the Government ought to make up the balance. That sounds all right, and abstractly that is all right; but the matter has been tested as to the indefinite proposition, and it was declared to be very unsatisfactory in the past, and the reasons for fixing it definitely have been pretty clearly stated by some of the leading statesmen of this country.

I want to read a statement that was made by one of the Senators in this body when the present law was enacted, in 1878. Of course, that is a good while ago; but the argument upon the principle of the thing applies, it seems to me, now just as well as it applied then.

Senator Blackburn, of Kentucky, said this:

> We have come down now to the naked question as to the proportion of the expenses of this District which the Federal Government should bear. This bill proposes that the proportion shall be 50 per cent, and the reasons for that basis of calculation have been very lucidly stated to the House.
> The people of the District have the right to demand that we fix permanently their relations to the Federal Government. It is the Federal Government on one side treating with the Federal city on the other. The people of this District have a right to protest against being left subject to the whim and caprice of Congress with each recurring session.
> They have and can have no tangible value to their real estate property. Should you go out, any one of you, to purchase a piece of real estate in the city of Washington, naturally you would ask in the first instance to what taxation it was subject. If the owner is an honest man, he can simply reply to you that he does not know * * *.
> This condition of things unsettles values in the District. No value can be attached to a foot of real estate owned by a property holder within the limits of this District, because the purchaser can not tell what taxation he will be subjected to. The people of the District have a right to demand that you shall fix this question permanently and finally. If you do not intend to bear more than 10 per cent of the burden of taxation, then say so; if you will bear 50 per cent of it, then say so. But whatever per cent the Federal Government is to bear should be determined and fixed permanently, so that legitimate and permanent land values may be established in this District.

Mr. President, I think that is an opinion that ought to be given very great weight. It appeals to me. It appeals to my judgment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Does not the fallacy of the argument suggested by former Senator Blackburn strike the Senator from Washington, whose clear mind, I am sure, is able to penetrate the sophistry which is there suggested? Let me illustrate.

If some one were to say to the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Wisconsin—both of whom, let us say, have property in their respective States—"I desire to buy this piece of property belonging to you, Senator JONES, or to you, Senator LENROOT, but I do not want to buy until I know what the taxes are going to be," what would you say? You would say to him: "Mr. Jones, I can not tell you what the taxes are going to be. The State of Washington is contemplating building roads that may cost $100,000,000, and it can issue bonds. The city in which I live is a progressive city. It contemplates inaugurating a system of education which will be superior to any in the United States, and it is going to bond for $25,000,000, possibly, for schoolhouses. I do not know what the taxes will be. The rate changes from year to year, and the amount changes from year to year, dependent upon the improvements which are inaugurated by the people." That is the case everywhere, and that never has and never will deter a man who seeks to buy property from purchasing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in my State—I do not know how it is in the Senator's—we have limitations upon the amount of indebtedness that can be incurred, imposed by constitutional provision that limits the taxation.

Mr. KING. That is true, if the Senator will pardon me; there is a limitation in most constitutions, probably all in the United States, all with which I am familiar, beyond which the States may not go; but, subject to that——

Mr. JONES of Washington. But that is a very important limitation. There is a limit upon cities and upon counties as well as upon the States.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the Congress of the United States is going to impose taxes here which would be in excess of the maximum which is permitted in the progressive States of the United States?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think we pay very much attention to the taxes in the States.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me further, does he not think that in view of the fact that most of the States have a limitation of 10 per cent in their constitutions, there would be nothing unfair in providing here that the people should pay merely a reasonable tax upon the value of their property—such a tax as is paid in the progressive cities of the United States—and that all of the balance shall be paid by the Government of the United States?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That involves the whole proposition, and I am going to try to discuss some of the questions involved if I get an opportunity.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves this question, may I just make a suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator read the statement of Senator Blackburn, made in 1878, in which he says that the citizen ought to know what his rate of taxation is going to be, because that would be the only way to determine the value of his property. We have an annual assessment in which the values change. Why should you not just as well say that the law shall be fixed so that you shall not change the assessed valuation, so that the man shall always know that you are not going to increase his taxation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think we have in this District a provision of law that the assessment shall be changed only at certain times.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is, every year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I think it is every three years.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, let us say every three years.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That gives him something definite.

Mr. LENROOT. That is another privilege that the taxpayers of the District have that the people generally do not have.

Mr. CARAWAY. But it still affects and must unstabilize values, if Senator Blackburn's argument is good for anything.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am perfectly willing to put Senator Blackburn's judgment with reference to some of these matters against the judgment of other Senators, and I will take my choice as to which, in my opinion, is right.

On this subject Mr. Poland, a Member of the House, in the report of the House Judiciary Committee, said this:

> As to the third and last branch of the resolution asking whether some accurately defined basis of expenditure could not be prescribed and maintained by law, your committee remark that they believe this to be of paramount importance both to the Federal and local government * * *.

It is believed that it will be much wiser and more economical, both to the national and local governments, to fix upon a definite sum or proportion to be contributed by both, and it is more important that these appropriations should be made regularly and upon some well-defined principle than that they should be large.

The House committee that had up the Mapes bill in the last session of Congress reported out that bill, and the minority of the committee submitted a minority report. When I say "the minority of the committee," in this case it does not mean the smaller number of the committee. As a matter of fact, when you examine the record you will find that the majority of that committee were against the bill that was reported, or at least they were equally divided. This minority report is signed by eight members of the committee. I examined the vote on the passage of the Mapes bill, and I found—it has been a year or so since I looked it up—that one or two of the committee who did not join in this minority report voted against its passage, and one or two were paired against its passage. My recollection is that the committee was really against the Mapes bill, instead of an actual minority being against it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask how the House stood on the Mapes bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, they passed it.

Mr. CARAWAY. By an overwhelming majority?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; they passed it. That is true; and they were very strongly and very firmly in favor of having a definite and fixed liability.

Mr. President, it was suggested a moment ago that the joint committee created by Congress a few years ago was in favor of doing away with the 50-50 plan. I asserted that it was on the theory that the proportion of the Federal Government should be larger than it is now. I may be wrong about that, but that is the way I construe the language of this report; and I have the language here, on page 19. This is what the committee says:

But we think that the conditions of to-day and of the few years last past are so different from the conditions of 1878 that this arbitrary rule—a rule of then seeming necessity—need no longer be applied to District appropriations.

That is true; the committee say they do not think it is necessary to apply the 50-50 rule longer.

Then the District was under a great debt; to-day that debt has been very largely paid, and the next few years will see it completely paid in the manner we have described herein.

Then the District was suffering from the many experimental forms of government which had been tried in successive years almost; to-day the form of government is one of long existence, tried and tested.

Then the population was less than one-half of the nearly 350,000 people who now reside in Washington.

Then the splendid utility and beauty of the city planned on a national base were just beginning to be seen; now the Government has many buildings which are of the very highest standard of architecture and has laid the foundation by purchase of additional areas of land for more public buildings, parks, and reservations.

Now, note this language:

More and more every year is land being acquired and held for strictly governmental purposes, withdrawn from participation in assessment and taxation.

What other conclusion can you draw than that the committee had in mind that if property is withdrawn from taxation and assessment the proportion of the Government should be greater to make up for that withdrawal?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. What did the committee have in mind when it said that the District had a large funded indebtedness in 1878, and now that indebtedness is paid, and therefore there is no longer any necessity for raising money to pay that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know what the committee had in mind.

The increasing needs of the Government in this, its central home, demand and will continue to demand more land, more buildings, more reservations.

All of this means that the District of Columbia and the National Government should not be longer on any partnership basis of contribution, but that the national city, the Nation's home, should be a district where the national authority is not only supreme but a district where the just pride of a great people should insist upon its maintenance in a manner most fitting to the dignity of the citizens whose manifestation of central government it is.

Nothing is clearer to us than it never was the intent that this District should bear all the very extraordinary burdens of expense incident to its plan and occupancy as a national city, and any such proposed burden would be most inequitable and unjust now.

Mr. President, it has been suggested that the tax on the property here is much less than it is in the States, and individual instances are cited. I do not know. I own no real property here. I know, however, of some particular instances, and I have been impressed with the view that many judgments are formed upon individual experiences with reference to taxation. I know this: One particular instance in my State was brought to my attention where property was assessed at $350 value. That was the basis of assessment. The rate of taxation was about 4½ per cent. Now, 4½ per cent compared with 1½ per cent sounds big, and we would at once conclude that the people of the locality where they are assessed 4½ per cent are paying a much bigger tax than they are here, where they pay 1½; and yet I know that while that property was assessed at $350 value it was sold for $2,000 cash. In other words, the tax that was paid upon that property was equivalent to no more than 1 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator if we assess on the basis of two-thirds of the value of the property here?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Two-thirds of the value.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, generally speaking, in the State of Washington are the taxpayers compelled to pay more than 1½ per cent, including State, county, and municipal taxes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I gave that instance. I do not know how far that goes.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator must have some general knowledge of taxation in his State, I presume. I have a knowledge of those matters in my State.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know about them in detail, but I know that while our law provides for the assessment of property upon the fair market value, very seldom is it assessed at more than 25 per cent of its value. I know it is true that in making the assessment they make it 25 or 30 per cent of the value of the property. That probably accounts for the high rate of taxation.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know what law the Senator may have in his State. I assume it is a full value law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They take the fair market value.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say to the Senator that in my State—Wisconsin—from one end of the State to the other, even in the rural communities, there can not be found any such low rate of tax, when you consider State, county, and municipal taxes, as is imposed in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This joint committee, which was selected by Congress, composed of Members of the House and of the Senate, found that—

It is, of course, not the purpose of this committee to act as a board of tax assessment and equalization of property within the District of Columbia, for that work obviously was not intended to be assumed by this committee. But we have heard evidence of tax assessments and tax rates in many American cities, some of this evidence being most instructive, other of it affording interesting comparisons as the conditions resembled or differed from conditions in Washington.

The annual tax in Washington is approximately $16 per capita.

In the judgment of your committee this is a reasonable tax levy at this time, especially when we consider, as we must, that a large proportion of the population here pays but a small amount of the taxes imposed.

The subjects of taxation in Washington differ somewhat from those of many other American cities. Here, for instance, intangible personal property is not a subject of taxation, and taxes on franchises and earnings of public-service corporations are not classed as personal taxes.

We find from the evidence of fair-minded men, residents of Washington familiar with real-estate values in general, that the present assessment of real estate for taxation is fair and reasonable.

Mr. President, I have not given this subject the investigation which would enable me to set my judgment up against the judgment of these men, who spent weeks, if not months, in trying to arrive at a just conclusion with reference to this matter. I find that the House committee went into the same thing, and in this minority report I find that they give details, and the detailed evidence is given in the report of this committee. In their report they do not analyze it particularly, but they state the conclusion which they have reached after studying all of that evidence. This is what the alleged minority of this committee say about this question:

For the fiscal year 1918 citizens of Washington paid a per capita realty tax of $16.55. Of the 68 other cities in the United States with over 100,000 population, 26 paid a higher per capita realty tax, 42 a lower.

This committee may have been wrong about that; I can not say as to that. The figures they present and the detailed figures in this other report bear out their statement.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator know whether those taxes were imposed to raise money for municipal purposes, or whether they included realty taxes for State and county purposes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I take it that it meant all the taxes which should legitimately be borne by the citizens of a city, which, of course, would include the school tax, and the city tax, and I suppose whatever State tax was necessary. At present there is no State tax imposed here in the District of Columbia, because we do not have a State. The people pay their income taxes and other taxes to the National Government.

Mr. LENROOT. But the people of the District have all the benefits of a State government which the people of a State have, do they not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no.

Mr. KENYON. Except the right to vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The people of the District have nothing to do with the formation of the Government, nothing to do with carrying it on, or saying how it shall be carried on, or anything of that sort. We in the States prize that privilege pretty highly and would not like to have it taken away; we would rather pay some tax than to have it taken away. But this committee evidently took into account everything they thought would put the people of the District upon a par with the people in the States, and that is the way they compared the taxes.

Mr. NORRIS. In view of the questions which have been asked of the Senator, as to what was included, I wish he would read again, so that we may clearly understand, what the per capita tax does include, as compared with the per capita tax in other cities. Does it say it is a realty tax?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It reads this way:

> The annual tax in Washington is approximately $16 per capita. In the judgment of your committee—

That is, the joint committee of Congress—

> this is a reasonable tax levy at this time, especially when we consider, as we must, that a large proportion of the population here pays but a small amount of the taxes imposed.
> We find from the evidence of fair-minded men, residents of Washington familiar with real estate values in general, that the present assessment of real estate for valuation is fair and reasonable.

Probably I had better read the preceding paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted the Senator to read, in connection with that, the statement he read a while ago about the other cities. Did that relate to real estate, or did it include only personalty?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will read that after I read a paragraph which I did not read before, because I did not think it bore upon this matter:

> The subjects of taxation in Washington differ somewhat from those of many other American cities. Here, for instance, intangible personal property is not a subject of taxation, and taxes on franchises and earnings of public service corporations are not classed as personal taxes.

Since that declaration was made, we provided for a certain tax on intangibles. It may not go as far as some think it should. This is from the minority report:

> For the fiscal year 1918 citizens of Washington paid a per capita realty tax of $16.55. Of the 68 other cities in the United States with over 100,000 population, 26 paid a higher per capita realty tax, 42 a lower.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it that had nothing to do with anything but real estate taxes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all with which that had to do.

Mr. NORRIS. That is very illuminating.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In the other report apparently it gave the full amount. It said:

> The annual tax in Washington is approximately $16 per capita.

Mr. NORRIS. But they probably were referring to real estate taxes in the minority report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. These were two different committees.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand, but the Senator has two reports there. One he designates as the minority report and the other he designates as the joint committee report. I do not know why he designates one as the minority report——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do that because it is designated as the minority report of the House committee.

Mr. NORRIS. In that the tax is designated as the real estate tax, both as to Washington and as to the other cities, and it says that in Washington the real estate taxes were $16.55 per capita.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. So I take it that the other must refer to realty taxes, or one or the other of them is wrong, if they refer to the same year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They refer to different years, I think.

Mr. CURTIS. The report from which the Senator is reading was made before the Sterling amendment was agreed to in the Senate. I think that explains to a large extent the difference between the two reports.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This report was made in 1916, and the minority report referred to taxes of 1918, so that they are different in that respect. As the Senator from Kansas has just said, this joint committee report was made before we adopted the intangible tax amendment. This reads further:

> For the same year the total per capita property tax in Washington was $20.68. Thirty of the 68 cities paid a higher and 38 a lower per capita tax.

That apparently covers all. I think that is a pretty significant statement. Unless Senators are prepared to show that that is not correct, it seems to me it is pretty overpowering, as far as the justice of the tax on the people of Washington is concerned. It continues:

> For the same year 50 out of the 227 cities in the United States which have a population of over 30,000 paid a higher per capita property tax than Washington, while 176 paid a lower.

Mr. STERLING. For what year?

Mr. JONES of Washington. For 1918. Senators may satisfactorily account for these figures, but they appeal very strongly to me when we come to consider the justice or the fairness of the tax situation in the city of Washington at the present time. It convinces me that the basis of taxation we have is fair and just and reasonable, not only to the citizens of the District but to the Government of the United States and the citizens of the entire country.

I do not think I care to take any more time of the Senate. I know there is room for controversy with reference to this matter. I know it has been charged from time to time that the people of the District of Columbia were not paying the taxes they ought to pay, and yet every investigation which has been made has come to a different conclusion. I have not taken the time to try to controvert the conclusion arrived at by the joint committee we provided. The men who composed that joint committee were men of high standing, men of great ability, and many of them were men of great business experience, and I want to say that I am satisfied to take their judgment, they having made the investigation they did.

Who composed that committee? Hon. W. E. Chilton, of West Virginia, was chairman of it. The other members upon the part of the Senate were Willard Saulsbury and John D. Works. No more careful, conscientious, painstaking Senators ever sat in this body than those three men. On the part of the House there were Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois, a man of long service; Warren Gard, of Ohio; and HENRY ALLEN COOPER, of Wisconsin.

As I said, I have not had the time to investigate this matter and attempt to show that these men were wrong. I may be neglectful of my duty, but I am willing to take their judgment with reference to the question as to whether or not the people of Washington are paying a fair and just rate of taxation. I believe they are, and I believe it is fair to them and fair to the Government and fair to the citizens of this Republic that the Government should say in plain, unmistakable terms, that it will pay 50 per cent of the necessary expenses of the Government, and that the other 50 per cent must be put up by the people of the District.

There are one or two other propositions in this bill to which I simply want to call the attention of the Senate. Under the act of 1878 the Commissioners of the District are prohibited from submitting estimates to Congress of the needed appropriations for the District in excess of the estimated revenues of the District, one-half from taxes and one-half from the Government. The result of that we feel to-day. I remember, I think it was last winter, when the matter of increased appropriations for the schools of the District was being agitated. My colleague, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], suggests that it was last spring when the commissioners came before the Appropriations Committee. We asked them why they had not submitted the estimates which were necessary to put the school system here on the basis on which it should be. They said they could not do it under the law. In other words, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are prohibited by law now from submitting to Congress estimates of what they consider to be the imperative needs of the District of Columbia. This bill relieves them from that limitation and allows them to submit to Congress the estimates which they think ought to be submitted to take care of the needs of the District, and then, of course, it leaves it to Congress to make appropriation for those needs or refuse the appropriation, as it sees fit.

Mr. STERLING and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota, who I think rose first.

Mr. STERLING. My attention has just been called to this bill, and particularly to section 3 of the bill, by the Senator from Minnesota. Section 3 provides:

That the per cent of approved estimates to be levied and assessed under the act of June 11, 1878, upon the taxable property and privileges in said District shall be raised by the imposition of such rate of taxation on realty and personal property as the commissioners shall ascertain to be necessary to raise annually.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Read on.

Mr. STERLING. I will do so:

In combination with other District tax revenues and unexpended tax surpluses of previous years, a sum sufficient to meet the proportion of expenses to be paid by the District of Columbia under existing law.

The question is whether that might not impliedly repeal the provision in regard to intangible property.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not at all. I am perfectly willing to have written in whatever may make that perfectly clear, but this language has been carried in two appropriation bills in the past and there has been no question raised about intangible taxes. I know at that time the idea of the committee was that this did not affect that at all, and that the words "in combination with other District revenues" simply took the tax upon tangible personal property and real estate and put it along with the intangible.

The only purpose of that language really is to provide that the tax now on real property and tangible personal property, which is 1½ per cent, can not be put lower than 1½ per cent. We did not think that it was wise for us to say that the intangible tax should be raised to 1½ per cent, because that might be right and it might not be right. We were not intending to affect the real tax system that we have—that is, the rate of taxation—except to say that it should not be less than 1½ per cent.

Mr. STERLING. As I understand it, the Senator said that such has been the interpretation of previous bills.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This language has been in two appropriation bills and there has been no question raised about it. I do not believe there can be any question. At any rate we certainly do not intend to affect intangible property. The intangible rate may be too low or it may be too high, but that is a matter for separate legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Washington state that by reason of this limitation upon the part of the commissioners, and the fact that the Congress has reduced the appropriation, there has been accumulated in the Treasury over $4,000,000 surplus, which the District people have been denied the use of because of the construction placed upon the matter on the part of another legislative body that it did not belong to them, although they had paid it in taxes and it is in the Treasury.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was just coming to that.

Mr. CURTIS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad the Senator suggested it. The Senator has stated it very clearly. We propose to take care of that and make available for the District that $4,000,000, or whatever it is, of surplus that has been taken from the taxpayers of the District and not used on the 50–50 basis. We believe that in justice and equity the money belongs to the citizens who paid it upon the theory and under the system that required the Government to contribute $1 for every dollar that they contributed, and should be used on that theory and on that basis. Then we provide, of course, that if in the future any surplus arises, it can be credited on the succeeding year, and if there is any deficit it has to be made by raising the 1½ per cent rate.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator realizes, too, that that surplus is a surplus which was not in part credited to the Government of the United States or taken from the Government, but was actually paid in by the taxpayers of the District.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; it was actually raised in taxes. It is contended in another body that that has gone into the Treasury of the United States and is the property and the money of the United States and that the citizens of the District have no right, title, or claim to it. In the pending bill the committee have recognized the claim of the citizens to that money and the claim that it should be expended for improvements of the District that we have heretofore had under consideration.

Then, as I said, we provide that this rate of taxation, 1½ per cent, may be raised by the commissioners if it is necessary to raise it in order to produce the 50 per cent which the people of the District must pay.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, this amount can not be raised except on real estate and tangible property.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; or by the intangible property tax imposed by the existing law.

Mr. NELSON. No. The provision about the increase in section 3 limits it to two kinds of property, real estate and tangible personal property.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think if the Senator will read it carefully he will see that we have not interfered with the intangible tax. We say that the tax on real property and tangible personal property, "in combination with other revenues," shall be so much. That includes intangible tax, license tax, and so on.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. KING. As I understand, there is no intangible tax, in the technical sense, levied now in the District; I mean that the intangible property of taxpayers is not fully reached—and millions that should be taxed are never reached. The bill which the Senator is now championing with so much ability confirms the present method of taxation, whether it is good or bad. As the Senator knows, if this bill becomes a law the Committee on Appropriations will follow it. It will not change the method of taxation or enlarge the variety of properties which will be taxed; indeed it will be an admonition to the District Committee and to the Appropriations Committee and to other committees that may deal with the question of taxation that Congress has again expressed itself in favor of a perpetuation of the present method of taxation and the objects of taxation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not believe anyone can construe the bill as an attempt to interfere with the system of taxation and the taxes on property in the District, except as it does give to the Commissioners of the District authority to raise the 1½ per cent rate upon tangible personal property and real property.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota, I think, can answer the suggestion of the Senator from Utah that we have no intangible tax.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly we have an intangible tax.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is the author of that measure.

Mr. KING. I am speaking from hearsay rather than from actual knowledge, but what I mean is that if one will examine the assessment rolls he will discover that property, both tangible and intangible, escapes taxation, and persons establish a residence, actual or fictitious, in the District of Columbia, as a result of which they escape taxation in their own States and also evade a proper tax in the District of Columbia. I was told of a case this morning by a Congressman from an adjoining State, a member of the joint committee investigating the schools of the District, which is not an isolated one. Three individuals from his State have established their nominal residence in the District of Columbia, and as a result they escape taxation upon their stocks and bonds and intangible property in their home State, and the limited amount of tax which they pay here is so small that the difference between that which they pay here and that which they would pay if they were taxed in their own State enables them to live in comparative affluence in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STERLING. Is the Senator satisfied that they have a right to escape an intangible tax imposed by the law of the District of Columbia? Is it not a rule or principle of law that personal property follows the residence of the owner for taxation purposes? Of course, we can not change the situs of real estate, but personal property follows the residence of the owner. If a resident of the city of Washington attempts to put his money on deposit in a bank in Baltimore or in a city outside of the District, I think he is liable to the intangible property tax on that money in the District of Columbia, if it be discovered.

Mr. KING. Another case that came to my notice showed that though the taxpayer paid tax here upon intangible property, he was able to save hundreds of dollars per annum because the tax here is so much less than that he would have been compelled to pay in his home State. It is claimed that under the system of taxation adopted here hundreds, if not thousands, of persons of great wealth establish their residence in Washington in order to avoid the heavy taxation in their own States. It is also claimed that if they paid a tax in the District of Columbia upon their intangible property based upon the assessment which is levied here they would save hundreds of thousands of dollars in the aggregate in the matter of taxes in the course of a year or two. In other words, the taxes are so much less in the District than in the States from which they come that the individuals who seek to establish a residence here are influenced in so doing by the pecuniary advantages derived therefrom.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that when the subject was first up in an amendment which I had the honor to offer to the District of Columbia bill I investigated the rate upon intangible property as fixed in States or by the laws of the States. The rate provided for here corresponds to the rate upon intangible property in the State of Minnesota. The tendency has been, I think, where there have been taxes imposed upon intangible property in the various States, to lower the rate, and that on the theory that intangibles can easily escape taxation and that the temptation is, if there is a high rate, for property to be disposed of or put in some other jurisdiction so it would escape taxation and no revenue at all be derived therefrom. I think the 3 mills tax rate here is perhaps now in accordance with the general theory in regard to intangible property taxes.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think many of the States in the Union tax stocks and bonds the same as they tax real estate. They tax according to value.

Mr. STERLING. I think that is not true generally I will say to the Senator from Utah. I think the disposition in later years has been to lower the tax on intangibles. It may be so in the Senator's State. For a time it was so in my State.

Mr. KING. If there has been a lowering of tax on intangible property there has been an augmentation of tax upon incomes.

Mr. STERLING. No; the theory of putting the low tax on intangibles is that there may be found that much more property subject to taxation than before. If the tax is too high it would not result in any revenue at all, because the property can so easily escape.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have taken much more time than I intended to take on this matter. It has been before the Senate many times and it has been before the House many times. As I said, we have had these investigations, and I have no doubt Senators have their minds pretty well made up as to what they are in favor of.

I believe that the 50–50 basis is fair and just to the people of the District, and is fair and just to the people of the country.

Mr. President, I desire to say further that I do not believe that the people of the country at large are worrying about the taxation here in the District of Columbia. I do not know how it may be in other States, but, if Senators will pardon a personal reference, three or four years ago when I had an opportunity during the summer I went over my State talking about the city of Washington, showing the people some views of the city, and I found that the people of my State approved unqualifiedly the statement that whatever expenditure was necessary in order to make the city of Washington the most beautiful city in the world I would stand for. There was no dissent upon the part of anybody, either in the audience or otherwise. The people of this country feel that this is their Capital; it is not the Capital City of the people of Washington, but it is the Capital City of the people of the United States. They are proud of it; they want to see it the mecca not only of the people of this country but of the people of the world. They want to see the people of this country instead of traveling abroad to Paris, to Berlin, and to other cities across the water come to Washington and see here everything that is best in architecture, best in sculpture, best in art and literature of every kind and character. They are willing that every dollar that is necessary to make this Capital of theirs really an education in itself shall be expended, and whenever any boy or girl, man or woman, comes here they are willing to pay every dollar that is necessary to make it that.

Mr. President, I do not believe that Congress can do anything better, anything that will be more satisfactory to the people of this country, than to assure them that it is going to do whatever is fair and reasonable in order to make this Capital City what the people of the country would like to have it made.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I merely desire to correct an impression which I fear I made in a statement called out by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I think I left the impression, if I did not say directly, that the tax on intangibles was three-tenths of 1 per cent in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. The Senator said 3 mills.

Mr. STERLING. Yes. Here is the provision of the law. I find that the tax is four-tenths of 1 per cent. The law provides:

That the moneys and credits, including moneys loaned and invested, bonds and shares of stock (except the stock of banks and other corporations within the District of Columbia the taxation of which banks and corporations is herein provided for) of any person, firm, association, or corporation resident or engaged in business within said District shall be scheduled and appraised in the manner provided by paragraph 1 of said section 6 for listing and appraisal of tangible personal property, and assessed at their fair cash value, and as taxes on said moneys and credits there shall be paid to the tax collector of said District four-tenths of 1 per cent of the value thereof.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon this bill I shall offer an amendment. In line 6 of the first page I shall move to strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "forty," and in line 7, to strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "sixty." The object of the amendment is to change the ratio or proportion from that contained in the bill, so that the Government will pay but 40 per cent and the District 60 per cent.

In view of the fact that the Conference on the Limitation of Armament is talking about ratios with respect to the navies of various countries, the Senator from Washington will probably be willing to use the ratio which I suggest. The question before us seems to be perennial. It has occupied the attention of Congress at various times for many years. When the population of the District was much less than at present, and property values insignificant, measured by the present value of the real and personal property within the District, as well as the intangible property subject to taxation, a ratio was established which this bill seeks to retain. It was then determined, as I am advised, that half of the expenses incurred in maintaining the government of the District should be paid from taxes derived from private property within the District, and that the Government should pay the remaining half.

But important changes have occurred since them. Washington has grown not only in population but in wealth. Thousands and tens of thousands of people have taken up their residence in Washington; some to engage in business, others to enjoy the benefits which result from the culture and the political and other advantages which exist here. It is said that many have established their residence in Washington in order to avoid the payment of taxes upon certain personal and intangible property which would be reached in the States from which they come and upon which heavy taxes would be exacted.

The reasons which prompted Congress to establish the 50–50 plan do not now obtain, and I have been unable to follow the logic of those who are now contending for the continuation of that system. The Senator from Washington seems to imply that the perpetuity of that system is essential to the growth and development of Washington, and in order to beautify the Capital of the Nation and make it a city so fair, architecturally and otherwise, as to surpass the capitals of all nations.

Mr. President, all Americans have pride in the Capital of their Nation. They have a pardonable pride in the capitals of their own States. They are also interested in the municipalities in which they reside and voluntarily impose heavy burdens for the construction of magnificent municipal buildings as well as State capitols. The interest which they have in these public buildings is manifested in the fact that they know that to realize their desires and their ambitions they will be compelled to pay millions of dollars annually in taxes and assessments.

The American people are willing that the National Government should do its full share for the development of the Capital of the Nation. They have pride in the splendid buildings which have been erected and would be glad to see Washington the center of American culture as it is the center of our national activities. They desire to see suitable departmental buildings erected and such national structures as the needs of this great Nation demand. But they also understand that those who reside in Washington are the beneficiaries of the expenditures made by the Government, and benefit not only in a material way but in an educational, in a political, and in a moral way from the generous contributions of the Federal Government and from its multitudinous activities within the District, activities which, though centered here, project themselves into various parts of the Republic. The American people also desire that those who own property within the District should pay a fair and just and honest tax. This they require and nothing more. They are willing that the National Government should meet all expenditures required to beautify and develop and improve this city, after the residents of the District contribute their fair and full share toward these great ends.

The Senator speaks of the great capitals of Berlin and Paris. He could have referred to London and other great capitals of Europe, such as St. Petersburg and Vienna as they existed before the war, where imposing buildings have been erected and everything done that the skill and genius of men could devise for their beautification and development.

But the Senator will discover upon examination that the residents of these great capitals paid heavy taxes and bore almost crushing burdens in order that the improvements which they desired might be made. Certainly the Senator can not contend that our interest in the Capital of the Nation and our desire to see it among the most beautiful cities of the world should lead to legislation which will relieve the residents of the District from the just and proper obligation to do their full share in meeting the expenditures which must be made.

Mr. President, I am in favor of liberal appropriations for the District. I join with those who are interested in the development of Washington. I have pride in its natural beauties and in the artificial additions which have been made. I shall vote for large appropriations for public buildings, for schoolhouses, for school grounds, for sanitation, and an adequate water supply, and for all measures needful to bring Washington to the summit of municipal excellence and of architectural beauty. I have often said that it was one of the best-governed cities in the world and that nothing should be omitted necessary to raise Washington to the highest standard of excellence.

As Senators know, a joint committee of the two Houses is now considering the educational needs of the District. This committee, of which I am a member, is earnestly devoting itself to the formulation of a plan that will provide the District with the finest school system that human wisdom can devise. They want to give to Washington the best school buildings, modern and up to date; buildings not only adequate for the present but for the immediate future. I am sure that the committee will report a plan that will indicate their deep interest in education and their earnest desire for Washington to lead the world in the public-school system.

The hundreds of thousands who reside here should be willing—and I believe the overwhelming majority are willing—to be taxed, and taxed heavily, for these municipal improvements and for these great governmental and social benefits. We must understand, and the people must understand, that in order to obtain good government and all of the advantages of modern civilization, heavy taxes must be paid by the people. There are some who expect fine parks, the best of highways, school buildings of the most approved style, sanitation that conforms to the highest scientific formula, waterworks, and all the important benefits that a high degree of culture and civilization not only portend but enjoy, without paying for the same. Those who are familiar with the enormous budgets of New York City and Philadelphia and Detroit and Cleveland and Cincinnati, and other cities of our country, know the tremendous burdens which the owners of property are compelled to bear in order to enjoy the blessings and advantages flowing from progressive municipal government. A high social state implies a vast organization and calls for enormous expenditures. If we must have street cars and illuminated streets and magnificent public buildings, modern police and fire protection, educational advantages of the highest order, and peace and law and protection, then we must be prepared to pay for the same. It also should be added that where these great advantages are found to exist, property values increase; so that there is compensation to be derived by the property holders in the enhanced value of their property resulting from municipal improvements.

Mr. President, the plan suggested by the Senator from Washington is illogical and arbitrary and can not be defended upon any rational hypothesis. He urges a ratio of 50–50. Why not 45–55, or 25–75, or 40–60, or why provide that the people of the District pay any part of the tax? If they are to be taxed at all, there must be some reason for imposing a tax. That reason is found in the fact that justice and equity require that the people of the District should pay for the benefits and blessings and advantages which they enjoy.

It is no answer to say that this is the Capital of the Nation and that the National Government possesses valuable public buildings within the District. As a matter of fact, the buildings, if they were not needed by the Government, would be comparatively valueless. If they have any monetary value it is only because the Government needs them. If the seat of government were removed to some other part of the Nation, the Government buildings within the District would possess little, if any, value. The parks owned by the Government are enjoyed by the people and are for the benefit of the people. The streets and highways, title to which rests in the Government, are of no advantage to the Government; indeed, they are a source of expense to the Government. They are valuable to the people who live in the District, to the property owners abutting upon the streets. Indeed, many of the streets have been opened up by the Government over and across private lands, and at the request of the owners of the same. The opening of the streets and their improvement by the District, added millions of dollars to the value of abutting and contiguous properties.

The improvement of parks, great or small, has added materially to the value of the properties abutting upon the same. The circles and squares and miniature parks sprinkled throughout the city add to the value of private property and enrich the people residing within the District. Is the Government to add to the wealth of the people and they be relieved from the costs which these improvements compel?

Mr. President, the rational and equitable course to pursue is to levy upon the property of the District—real, personal, mixed, tangible, and intangible—a fair tax; a tax such as would be paid upon properties in the progressive cities of the United States, whose population was substantially the same as that of the District. In other words, the value of all private property within the District—real, personal, mixed, tangible, and intangible—the value of franchises, and all property which is subject to taxation in progressive and enterprising cities and States, should be ascertained and then a levy should be made upon such property as would be fair and just.

We know that in modern and up-to-date cities the city, county, and State taxes are between 3 per cent and 5 per cent upon valuations of from 60 per cent to 100 per cent. There is no reason why Washington should not pay similar taxes to those paid in other developed and progressive cities. I summit that a plan of taxation of this character should be adopted. If the revenues derived under this plan prove inadequate—and such I am sure would be the case—for the needs of the city, then the Federal Government should make up the balance. It may be in time that if the plan which I have suggested were adopted the needs of the city would be such as to call for 60 per cent, or perhaps more, of all the operating expenses of the Government to be paid from the National Treasury.

I am entirely willing, Mr. President, to support a plan that will impose upon the National Government the burden of paying any deficit that may be incurred in meeting all the expenses of the District after the property within the District has paid a fair and reasonable tax.

I do not believe in this arbitrary apportionment or ratio. I do not believe in the 50–50 plan or the 40–60 plan. As stated, the only fair, scientific, and logical plan is to tax all property within the District that would be subject to taxation in any modern and progressive community, and at such rates as prevail in such communities, and then call upon the Federal Government to make up the balance required to meet all the expenses incurred in maintaining the District government.

Now, Mr. President, I move, as suggested at the outset of my remarks, to amend the pending bill by striking out in line 6 the word "fifty" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "forty"; and in line 7, I move to strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "sixty."

As stated, the amendment which I tender is not logical. It is arbitrary, as is the bill itself, but it is fairer than the measure before us, because investigation has shown that if any fair and just system of taxation were adopted for the purpose of raising revenue to meet the expenses of the District the property of the District would be called upon to pay at least 60 per cent. I have indicated, however, that the proper and fair way was to impose a just and reasonable tax upon private property of the District and then have the Government pay whatever else may be required to meet all expenses of the District.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I reserve the right to offer the same amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I want just a moment of the time of the Senate to discuss this measure.

I concede that the people of the District of Columbia should pay no more tax than the people in any progressive city of like size and advantages. I have always felt that I could not justify my position nor maintain my self-respect if I wanted to impose burdens on people who were not in a position to resist the imposition. On the other hand, if this is to be the National Capital, as the Senator from Washington said, the most beautiful city, the city to which all people might and should point with pride, I do not believe that it ought at the same time to be a city of refuge for those who want special privileges, who do not want to bear their fair burden of taxation. It seems to me to be a travesty to bring our constituents here and point out the magnificent parks, libraries, streets, and public buildings, and then say: "The people who live here not only enjoy all these benefits, but by act of Congress we relieve them from their fair share of the burdens of maintaining them, and put it on you who come here, maybe, once in a lifetime," and most of them do not come at all.

Answering one other suggestion of the Senator from Washington, which I am sure he would not urge if he would stop to think, he argues that we ought to relieve the people of the District of Columbia of taxes because they have not a right to vote.

In other words, he wants to write into the law here a discrimination in their favor, and then justify it by saying: "We made you sell your birthright. We have assessed against the people at large the privilege of voting, and we have taken away from you the right to be an American citizen, and we compensate you by reducing your taxes." I hardly believe that anybody wants to go out and defend the proposition that he took away from a man his right of American citizenship and compensated him for it by reducing his taxes.

I think everything that possibly can be said in this matter has been said over and over much better than I could say it, but I want to say this again:

I am entirely familiar with the report of the joint committee. It nowhere says—there is not a line of evidence in it from beginning to end—that the 50–50 plan was fair and equitable. It repudiates it in its report. The whole testimony offered by everybody who testified, except those people who were directly interested here in the District of Columbia in getting a low assessment, shows that it was inequitable and unfair. There are certain people everywhere—possibly no more here than there are in my own State and other States—who are perfectly willing to accept favors. If the Government will relieve them from paying taxes, they raise no complaint at the action of the Government; but that is not the question with which we are confronted. We are here—and, by the way, most of us are taxpayers in the District of Columbia.

Ninety per cent of the people who will vote on this question have a pecuniary interest in it. I have. If I should vote with my interest, I should vote to keep the levy 50-50, and vote to make my taxes in the District of Columbia not more than one-third of what they are in the average community, because I take it that my rate of taxes at home is not much greater than in a similar community in any other State; and, notwithstanding that fact, we have many advantages here that we do not enjoy there. We have magnificent parks, libraries, art galleries, broad, magnificent streets, well lighted and clean, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] called to our attention; and with all those advantages we pay less or not exceeding one-third of what we pay in the way of taxes on property of equal value at home.

If there were any justification—and I deny it—in saying that so much of the Government's property is located here and it occupies such a vast area as compared to the entire area of the District of Columbia that you can not figure out a just rate of taxes, I should suggest that in some of the Western States, where practically 90 per cent of the property is in the Government, where vast forests are set aside as national forests not for the benefit of the people in those States but to secure and to provide an adequate supply of timber for all the people of all the United States, the Government ought to be willing to pay at least a part of the taxes of those communities. In my own State we have, as I now recall—and I am speaking offhand—about 4,000,000 acres in a national forest. In some counties they occupy more than 50 per cent of the area of the counties. The value of that property is largely enhanced by reason of the fact that there are improvements made in the counties, that roads are built, that the protection of law is extended to the Government's property by reason of the enforcement of law throughout the county, and yet the Government does not pay one penny toward maintaining local government in the county or the State—not a nickel. More than 50 per cent of the area of the county is withdrawn. All the burdens of county government fall upon the people occupying less than 50 per cent of the county. As I suggested, some of the Western States have 90 per cent of their area withdrawn for the public good, and not one penny is paid by the National Government to maintain the State governments.

If we feel that the conditions that exist here in the District of Columbia are such that they appeal to us, and we ought to tax all the people to relieve from taxation the people here, we ought to do the same thing for the people in Arizona. There is a sense of justice underlying it that appeals to me. The Senator from Florida said he figured out that the people of Florida paid only $2 each toward maintaining the National Government. Of course he is in error about that; but if it were only 50 cents a question of right or wrong underlies it. If the people of the District of Columbia pay a fair tax, they ought to pay no more; but until they do pay a fair tax they ought not to come to the Federal Government for special favors.

I want to make the city what it should be. I am in favor of appropriations to give them the advantages they are entitled to receive. I want them to pay only a fair tax, and the remainder can come from the Federal Government; but to say that they ought to pay only 50 per cent, when all of us know that 50 per cent borne by the Government practically relieves them of two-thirds of their taxes, does not appeal to me; and I hope the bill will not pass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I gave notice that I should reserve for a separate vote in the Senate the amendment which I tendered a few moments ago; and before that vote is taken I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. HEFLIN. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent, attending the Limitation of Armament Conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a quorum was called to vote upon an amendment which I had offered to the pending measure. Obviously no considerable number of Senators will be here to vote upon this amendment or upon the bill. Whenever a 50–50 measure is before the Senate, for some unaccountable reason it awakens no interest and provokes but little if any opposition. It seems to be a foregone conclusion that the Senate will support any bill that imposes upon the property of the District a small tax—a tax represented in this 50–50 plan. It has been suggested to me that if this bill were properly labeled it would be called "a bill to protect the residents, property owners, and real-estate dealers of the District of Columbia, and a number of more or less transient tax dodgers, from the payment of an honest and fair tax for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the District." May I suggest to my good friend, the Senator from Washington, that he further examine this bill and all its effects and implications with a view to determining how much of truth there is in the indicated title suggested for this measure? Let us be entirely frank and fair in considering this bill. Its object is to prevent the adoption of a tax system, based upon values and benefits. Its purpose is to require the people of the United States to pay one-half of all the expenses incurred and to be incurred in the District government in the construction of municipal improvements, in the erection of schoolhouses, in the meeting of the proper and legitimate expenses necessary to provide the people of Washington with the finest and best city government in the world, even though such a plan would relieve the property owners of the District from the payment of a just and honest tax.

Let us tell the people of the United States that we propose to make this the most beautiful city in the world, but we are going to make the people of the United States make a larger contribution than is fair or reasonable. Let us say we are so interested in those who have holdings within the District and some who have established residences here to avoid paying taxes in their own States, that we are so solicitous for the real estate dealers and other property holders that we will not adopt any system of taxation which would require them to pay a reasonable tax upon the fair market value of their property.

This bill finds no parallel in any legislation in any country or in any city. It is worse than an anachronism; it spells inequality, special privilege, and sectional favoritism. It places Washington in a special position. It throws over private property an ægis, a shield not provided for property elsewhere, and extends immunity to individuals claiming residence here denied to persons anywhere else in the United States.

A just system of taxation is to be desired. To secure it is a task that engages the serious efforts of publicists and statesmen. Equality in taxation is a fundamental principle in this Government. We are now conjured to enact a permanent statute under the terms of which a plan of taxation is to be adopted which contravenes accepted canons of taxation, and which I submit can not be defended upon any theory which finds expression in revenue legislation in the United States. Is there something sacred in this 50-50 program which is so vehemently urged? It would seem that the property of the District of Columbia is so sacred that it must be protected from taxation.

Let me ask the Senator from Washington, if I may have his attention, if he will consent to an amendment to this bill to this effect, that all of the property within the District of Columbia, real, personal, and mixed, including franchises, and all forms of intangible property, which in progressive communities is subject to taxation, shall be assessed at the market value, and then be subjected to a just and reasonable rate or levy, and the revenue derived therefrom to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be devoted to meeting the expenses of the District government, and that whatever sum or amount in addition thereto may be required to meet such expenses shall be appropriated by the National Government. Will the Senator accept an amendment of that character?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I would not accept an amendment of that character. I would be willing to take up any tax proposition, however, correcting any inequalities in the tax laws which the Senator may propose. I presented the reasons why I thought there ought to be something definite and certain with reference to the proportion which should be paid by the District and by the United States, and I thought I gave very good authority for it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the authority largely consisted of a statement by former Senator Blackburn, of Kentucky. The principal reason assigned by him for his position was that if one desired to purchase property he would want to know the rate of taxation to which such property would be subject. As a reason, measured by practical experience, it is not only fallacious but it is absurd.

I call the attention of Senators to the fact that no one in any progressive State or municipality knows what the taxes for the coming year or the immediate future will be. Who can predict with certainty the rate of taxation or the value which will be placed upon property in New York, Washington, or Wisconsin, or any city or State of the Union for the year 1923 or 1924? Not only values but rates vary from year to year. The requirements of cities and States and political subdivisions differ each year, so it is impossible to fix any sum as the certain amount which will be required for taxes for a given period. One year a State may be engaged in road building, the next year it may be engaged in a comprehensive scheme for public improvement of a different character. It may want a capital. So it adjusts its taxes with reference to its needs, and the man who buys real estate or personal property in a State or municipality buys with the knowledge that no one can definitely determine what his taxes will be.

Why should the inhabitants of the District of Columbia be placed upon a different footing from persons residing in other cities? It is quite possible that real estate purchases in Washington may be increased by reason of the supposed permanent policy of the Government to tax the property within the District in such a manner that it will yield but 50 per cent of the costs of running the District government. But that is no sufficient reason for adopting an unfair system of taxation.

Mr. President, it is human nature, perhaps, to seek to lighten one's burdens, and it seems to me that behind this measure is a desire upon the part of some property holders in the District of Columbia to escape paying a fair and just tax. I readily concede the honesty and high integrity of Senators supporting this bill, but I believe they are mistaken in their course and are unconsciously promoting an unreasonable and unjust plan.

Why should the people of the District of Columbia, and the property of the District, pay a lower tax than is paid in other progressive cities of the United States? Do not the people here enjoy benefits? Do they not have schools? Do they not have all of the concomitants of a splendid and progressive civilization? Indeed, the advantages enjoyed by the residents of the District are in many ways greater than can be found in any city in the world. Yet with all these advantages, shelter is sought under the protection of Congress in order to escape fair and just taxation.

The House over and over again has denounced this scheme, and the Senate over and over again has approved it. Why is the Senate so zealous in extending protection to the taxpayers of the District of Columbia? Why are Senators so solicitous to have the property owners escape paying a fair tax? Why should not Senators vote for a proposition that the people of the District shall pay a reasonable, a fair, and a just tax, and, after having done that, whatever deficit results in the administration of the affairs of the District, that the Government of the United States shall pay the residue? That would be fair, and if, upon that plan, the Government pays 50 per cent, or 60 per cent, or 70 per cent, no one could object. Let the people pay a just tax, and let the Government of the United States pay the balance.

Let me say to the Senator that the amendment which I have offered provides that the District shall pay 60 per cent and the Government 40 per cent. I do not justify that upon the ground that it is logical. It may be unfair. It is just as logical as the 50-50 ratio, and I know it is very much fairer, because from the investigations which I have made I know that the District property should pay 60 per cent or more of the burdens of taxation in this District.

But if the Senator will not accept the proposition that the people here shall pay a reasonable tax and a fair tax, and insists upon a ratio, upon a proportion, then let him accept the one which I have suggested, which is fairer. If my recollection serves me rightly, we are already operating under the 60-40 ratio. The House insisted, when the Senate adhered to its 50-50, upon the 60-40 ratio; they compelled the Senate to accept that, and they are operating under that now, and, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] suggests, are obtaining surplus revenues. Notwithstanding the fact that the District is now paying 60 per cent, the Senator from Washington and other members of the District Committee are determined to force through the Senate a bill which will relieve the property holders of the District from paying one-sixth, measured in percentages, of the taxes which they are now paying.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this is a bill the purpose of which is to reduce the taxes now imposed upon the District of Columbia and make the people of the United States outside of the District contribute to the upkeep of the District a larger portion than they are now contributing. That is the effect of the bill; that is the only purpose of the bill; and before the Senate should be asked to act favorably upon a proposition of that kind its proponents should be able to show conclusively to the Senate that the taxes now paid by the District are so great as not to be just and reasonable.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Is not the Senator mistaken in his statement that this reduces the taxes to be paid? It will have no effect of that kind. The present law, which expires July 1 next, fixes the rate at 60–40, and the rate for the ensuing year will have to be fixed in the next District appropriation bill.

The object of the pending bill, as I understand it, is to try to reach an agreement between the House and the Senate on a policy. The bill has fixed the rate at 50–50, because that is the existing law and has been held as the fundamental law of the District by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. It is not the existing law for this year.

Mr. CURTIS. I mean it is the permanent law, and we only amended it for the year in the District appropriation bill.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. My statement is exactly correct that the contribution now is upon the basis of 60–40, and the purpose of the bill is to make the basis of 50–50 instead of 60–40.

Mr. CURTIS. Again I state that the present basis of the permanent law is 50–50, and while it was changed in the appropriation bill to 60–40 it can be changed again to 60–40 in the next appropriation bill if the two Houses can not get together in the meantime on a satisfactory basis.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator says this is for the purpose of getting an agreement upon this much controverted question between the House and the Senate, and yet this bill proposes to compromise by having the House surrender its position and go back to the present law, which, of course, the House will not do.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I may not understand it fully, but it seems to me that the bill is almost useless. If the Senator from Kansas is correct—and I presume he is—that the permanent law provides for a 50–50 division, and in an appropriation bill Congress disregarded that permanent law and made the appropriation on the basis of 60–40, what good would it do to reenact existing law and provide for a 50–50 basis if Congress again, if it saw fit when it comes to the next appropriation bill, could change it and put it in any other ratio for that particular year? What are we accomplishing, whether we pass it or not?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will yield further——

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to state first that it has always been the practice, or was up to two years ago, if one House added an amendment that in any way changed existing law, that if the other body insisted upon existing law or the permanent law the body making the change would give in or recede. Two years ago the House refused to do that, and the Senate, in order to pass the bill, yielded to the 60–40 basis. The same thing occurred in the last appropriation bill. So far as I am concerned, I do not think the 60–40 or 50–50 makes very much difference, except the 50–50 is the amount voted for by the Senate at all times.

However, there are provisions in the bill which, I think, are of vast importance to the District of Columbia. For instance, if the bill passes there will be no more surpluses put in the Treasury, or if there is a surplus the District will be permitted to use it. Under the practice which has been followed heretofore for years little surpluses have accumulated from year to year and have gone into the Treasury of the United States, and now amount to over $4,000,000. Last year millions or more were needed to build schoolhouses in the District; when the streets needed improvement, we attempted to use this surplus, and were prevented from doing it because the Members of another body claimed that the money did not belong to the taxpayers who had paid it in, but that it was money belonging to the United States. If this bill is passed—and these, I think, are the most important provisions—arrangements are made for the use of the surplus, or, if there is a deficit, to make it up out of the surplus of the next year or the next year thereafter.

I think the other provisions of the bill are of much more importance to the people of the District and of the country than is the 50–50 proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to know whether I understand, and I think I do understand, the effect of the provision to which the Senator from Kansas is now referring. I wish to ask him if the effect is not this: Let us assume that next year the estimates are made and the amounts are appropriated that may call for a rate of tax of 2 per cent, but that creates a surplus. Now, in succeeding years the Government will still contribute dollar for dollar every dollar raised by the District, but the District will have the benefit of the surplus in future years that we have created out of this appropriation. Is not that true?

Mr. CURTIS. No. The Government can only contribute its part to pay the actual expenses, and no dollar of the surplus that is now in the Treasury was contributed by the General Government, but every dollar of that money was paid in by the taxpayers of the District.

Mr. LENROOT. But what about future surplus?

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is the author of that provision, and I would rather he would answer that if he will. I know, but I would rather he would state it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if they should have a surplus next year that surplus would be credited on the amount raised by the District for the next year.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I was correct in my statement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It takes nothing from the Government at all.

Mr. LENROOT. It takes from the Government because the Government still matches dollar for dollar.

Mr. CURTIS. No; it does not match until it is used.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand that, of course.

Mr. CURTIS. Then under the rule ought not the Government put in its proportionate share when it is used?

Mr. LENROOT. Even though it has created a surplus, and then again is used and then again taken out of the District's share, the Government must contribute again dollar for dollar.

Mr. CURTIS. That is not the intention. As I understand it, this was the intention: If there is a surplus this year of $2,000,000, all paid in by the taxpayers, because the tax rate levied brings in $2,000,000 more than is required to meet the District's half, the Government pays no additional amount, but the District people pay $2,000,000 more than is needed. That goes into the Treasury. Now, next year if that surplus is used which the Government has not met this year, then the Government meets it, and does not meet it until it is used, so there is but one matching, and that is made when the money is used.

Mr. LENROOT. I confess I am not familiar with this, but we will suppose, to illustrate, that the amount raised for the District is $5,000,000, $2,000,000 more than is needed. The Government has contributed a million dollars of that.

Mr. CURTIS. No; it does not contribute a cent of that.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us put it another way. Here is $10,000,000 raised by the District and the Government contributes $10,000,000.

Mr. CURTIS. Not unless the $20,000,000 is needed and used. When they fix this tax levy they find that $18,000,000 is needed and the Government only pays in $9,000,000 of the $10,000,000 which it otherwise would have paid in, but the District pays in the full $10,000,000. That leaves the District a surplus of a million dollars, but no surplus on the part of the Government, because the Government stops at $9,000,000. The Government only meets what the District uses.

Mr. LENROOT. When that million dollars for the following year is used the Government contributes a million dollars, does it not?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly. It meets it then instead of this year.

Mr. LENROOT. And the taxpayers are to get the benefit?

Mr. CURTIS. Why not? They paid it in.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. The result, then, is to reduce the charge upon the taxpayers constantly if there be a surplus.

Mr. CURTIS. If there be a surplus it simply reduces the amount of taxes for the next year and the Government does in the next year what it otherwise would have done the year before if the money had all been used in the year before.

Mr. LENROOT. So the Government must at all times, whether the money is needed, match dollar for dollar the money raised by taxation in a given year for the purposes of that year, but whenever used the Government must match every dollar that is raised at some time or other.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true, and I think that is fair.

Mr. LENROOT. It all goes back to the question of whether the residents of the District are paying a reasonable rate of taxation. If they are paying no more than is reasonable, why should the Government make a contribution based wholly upon that arbitrary proposition that the Government shall match dollar for dollar?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong the debate, but when the Commissioners of the District of Columbia put in an estimate that they will require, say, $24,000,000, and the tax levy is made and they raise from the District taxpayers $12,000,000, but the Congress takes from the District schoolhouses, the Congress refuses to improve a road, and by those and similar means reduces the amount which the Government would contribute, is it under those circumstances fair to the taxpayer then two years later, when these new schoolhouses are built or this street is improved and the money which they have already paid in as taxes is used, to relieve the United States Government from its share?

Mr. LENROOT. The Government will appropriate whatever the Government finds is necessary for the District of Columbia, and the taxpayers of the District of Columbia ought to pay that proportion of the amount appropriated which will be a fair tax for them. The Government should pay the difference, whether it be more or whether it be less than was raised by taxation.

Mr. CURTIS. As I said a moment ago, I do not care to delay the passage of the bill. The question has been before the committee for many years. I have read the report made in 1878 and all the evidence taken and the reports made by the committee in 1918. As chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the District appropriation bill for a number of years, I have believed that 50–50 was about as near right as it could be, but I have tried, as chairman of that subcommittee, to get the question into conference, so that six Members of the Senate and House could get together and see if we could not agree upon some proposition with reference to it. If I was wrong, as the then chairman of the subcommittee I was willing to give in. We passed a bill. We could not settle it on the appropriation bill, so we passed the bill as a separate measure, sent it to the House. For some reason the conferees did not meet for months.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas this question: Why is it not a fair proposition to ascertain what is a fair rate of taxation here, whether it be the amount in this bill or in existing law, or some other rate, and then provide that that amount shall be raised, and that the Government out of the Treasury of the United States shall appropriate the difference, whether it be more or whether it be less.

Mr. CURTIS. I probably would not be permitted to state just why I have opposed that proposition. If it could be carried out to the letter and the Congress would be fair to the people of the District of Columbia, I do not believe I would oppose it. But I must say, and I say it after having presided over that subcommittee for a number of years, that there has been an attempt made by the Congress to reduce the appropriations for the District far below what was needed. With all the fighting that could be done, and all the showing that the District people make before the committee, and all the efforts that could be put forth, we could not get the money that was actually needed. I think every Senator, if he will visit the schoolhouses, will admit that Congress has not provided sufficient schoolhouses: that it has not provided sufficient playgrounds. The streets are in an awful condition and should be improved, and the blame is on the Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is true under the 50–50 proposition, it is very evident that it is due to some other cause than this proposition, because this will not help that situation.

Mr. CURTIS. As I said a moment ago, I believed, as this had been provided as the fundamental law, had been declared virtually the constitution of the District of Columbia by the Supreme Court of the United States, that it was our duty to stand by the 50–50 proposition, believing further, as I did, that it was about as fair a basis as we could have until the two bodies of Congress could get together and agree upon something that would be reasonable and fair. I still believe that this is the best way to do it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Kansas does not mean by his statement as to what the Supreme Court did that that inhibits Congress from passing any sort of bill we see fit?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, certainly. I have just stated that I think it ought to stand until Congress does act.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator thinks that we ought to change, and change it in all fairness and reasonableness, and impose upon the property in the District of Columbia fair and reasonable taxes?

Mr. CURTIS. I certainly do.

Mr. KING. And let the Government pay the balance?

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Government ought to pay the balance, but I am not ready to say that 60–40—although I gave in as chairman of the subcommittee for two years—is fair and just for the people of the District.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with due regard to the Senator from Kansas, I get rather tired of hearing about this law of 1878 being the fundamental law in the nature of a constitution for the District.

Mr. CURTIS. I was simply using the language of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand that, and very proper language for the Supreme Court or any administrative body to use, but for the Congress of the United States that made it and the Congress of the United States whose jurisdiction it is to change it, there is nothing sacred about it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have not claimed that there was anything sacred about it. In fact, I have said I should like to see it changed; I should like to see the two bodies get together.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but I think, Mr. President, that the bodies can get together a great deal quicker and a great deal easier if the Senate shall propose something that is different from existing law, which we know the House of Representatives will not accept. The House—and I was a Member of that body during a part of this controversy—I may say, has not very much confidence in the Senate in dealing with this question. If the Senate would show a little greater disposition to agree upon some reasonable basis, the two Houses would get together a great deal easier upon this subject. I have the greatest confidence, of course, in the members of the committee, but there is an impression at the other end of the Capitol that the Senate in dealing with this question has paid not very much attention to its merits, but has paid a good deal of attention to the wishes of real estate owners in the city of Washington. I do not believe that; I believe the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has considered and studied this matter faithfully and is just as honest in his opinion as is any Member of the other House.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I have previously said, I have read all of the hearings contained in the report of the commission of 1878 and the hearings of 1918, and I have taken the position which I thought was right, and I feel sure the Senator would have taken the stand I did if he had been on the conference committee.

I wish further to say to the Senator that if it had not been for the fact that the District appropriation bill carried the money for the schools of the District of Columbia, the bill probably would have been killed; but, as one of the conferees, I did not feel that I had the right to deprive the people of this District of the appropriations which they needed simply because I was not pleased with the attitude of the conferees of the other House.

Mr. LENROOT. Had I been a member of such a conference committee I should have done exactly as the Senator did, if I had held his views; but I want to say, Mr. President, that, in my opinion, the passage of this bill is not going to improve the situation of which the Senator now speaks; the passage of the pending measure is not going to conduce, upon an appropriation bill or otherwise, to a getting together of the two Houses or create a better feeling upon the part of the Members of the other House who hold the views they do with reference to this very important question. On the contrary, if this bill passes, I prophesy this afternoon that the House of Representatives will compel the Senate conferees again to do exactly what they did on the last bill, or there will be no bill. That is one reason why I do not think this bill ought to pass.

Mr. President, the 50–50 proposal can not be justified upon any basis of reason. It is an arbitrary proposition. Who is there can say that because the seat of government is here that a 50 per cent ratio is just what the Government ought to pay for the upkeep of this District?

Senators talk about the parks here and the property that has been removed from the field of taxation. So far as parks are concerned, every other city in the United States provides parks out of its own taxes and maintains them out of its own taxes, which has not been done here in the District of Columbia. That is true also as to many other things which the people of the District here enjoy; not on a 50–50 basis, but on a basis of the entire expense being paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

While it is not an argument which appeals to me, when Senators talk about one-half of the property being withdrawn from taxation and the burden of the taxpayers being thereby increased, I desire to suggest that there is not a city in the United States of the same population as Washington which would not be delighted to make a proposition to remove the seat of government to their city and to pay every dollar of taxes. I repeat that, of course, that is not an argument, and yet it is quite as good an argument as some of the arguments that have been used upon the other side of this question.

It is also true that whenever a hundred acres are withdrawn for the purpose of a park here in the city of Washington the value of the surrounding property is immediately increased, sometimes in the aggregate a great deal more than the original value of the property withdrawn from taxation.

Mr. President, I do not wish to see the people of this District pay one single dollar more of taxes than is just; I would not wish them to pay any more in taxes than is paid upon the average by people of other cities, although it is true—I am not speaking of the political rights now—that the people of the District of Columbia do enjoy privileges furnished by the United States Government, paid for out of the Treasury of the United States, increasing the value of private property in the District, which people of other cities do not enjoy.

It seems to me clear that there is but one proper, reasonable basis upon which the taxation question should be settled. We ought to have a commission—and on it there should be no one owning any property in the District of Columbia, I may say—which should ascertain what is the average rate of taxation for all purposes in cities of the size of Washington, and, having ascertained what that average rate is, apply it. If it is one-half, as is provided now, well and good; let it stand and let that be the rate. Then, whatever amount is necessary in order to meet the deficit created by appropriations made by Congress for the District of Columbia should be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, whether it be more than 50 per cent or whether it be less than 50 per cent.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. I should like to ask a question. How would the Senator arrive at values that would be comparable for the purpose of determining what the taxation here should be? Assessments are not the same in any two cities in the United States. They are supposed to be based on full value, but we well know that they are not, and never have been.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a commission properly constituted could get sufficient information as to the proportionate rate of assessments which is practically uniform. In some cities the assessment is upon a two-thirds basis or a 50 per cent basis or a 75 per cent basis. That can easily be ascertained.

Mr. PHIPPS. On two-thirds or 75 per cent of what?

Mr. LENROOT. Of the true value of the property.

Mr. PHIPPS. Of the true value of the property, which is an estimated value.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course it is.

Mr. PHIPPS. And which is estimated differently not only in different cities but in different parts of the same city.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; that is true.

Mr. PHIPPS. So that a fair basis could hardly be arrived at in that way.

Mr. LENROOT. Nevertheless, that kind of an estimate would at least have some basis in judgment, whereas the proposition for which the Senator now stands is purely arbitrary.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator from Wisconsin preceded me in service here, and I never had the honor of being a Member of the other body; but the Senator, I think, will hardly recall a time when there was a dispute over the 50–50 arrangement as between the Government and the District of Columbia until we became involved in the World War, when, by reason of the neglect to erect school buildings, to construct roadways, and to carry on other public works, the proportion of 100 per cent which was paid in according to the estimates by the city taxpayers was not used and became a surplus which was held in the Treasury of the United States. The accumulation of that surplus is the reason why this proposition was advanced by the House; otherwise we would never have heard any criticism of the 50–50 plan. That is the information I have. If the Senator has any different information, I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. LENROOT. I can correct the Senator's information, for I was a Member of the House long before the World War began, and this subject was then one of the very acute subjects of controversy. There were investigations and reports made upon this very proposition long before we entered the war.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I have been a taxpayer in two other cities of the Unites States, as well as a taxpayer in this city. I have no personal reason for wanting to see the rate of taxation kept low on the real estate in this city, other than that the citizens of the District of Columbia should be fairly treated, but I am strongly of the opinion that the rate of taxation I am called upon to pay in the District is at least as great as it has been in the other cities where it has been my privilege to live.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is true, the Senator from Colorado is very fortunate in the ownership of his property in other cities.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Colorado indicates that this is a new question and if it had not been for the war and some accumulation of taxes in the Treasury we would never have heard of it.

Mr. PHIPPS. That, as I have stated it, is my information.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that I had the honor to be a Member of the House of Representatives 18 years ago, and it was then a subject of discussion, and I contended at that time that a fair system of taxation would be one which would impose upon the property of the District of Columbia a reasonably fair rate of taxation, the Government to pay the residue.

Mr. PHIPPS. To my mind, Mr. President, the trouble lies in the difficulty of arriving at a method of determining a fair basis. Are you going to take the value of all the property in the District, including the value of the public buildings? Would that be agreed to as a basis?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. PHIPPS. No; that is the answer of the House; they would not listen to that. They say that all property should be treated alike; that the Government should only pay its proportion, and yet when they are asked if they are willing to take a definite valuation of real estate and all improvements in the District as a basis and allow the Government to pay whatever proportion its share is shown to be of the total valuation, the answer is "no," just as the Senator from Wisconsin answers "no."

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. PHIPPS. They do not want to take that basis. Why not? Is not that fair?

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that would be fair?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think that would be eminently more fair than the suggestion made by the Senator under which an effort would be made to arrive at the valuation obtaining in other cities.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see about that.

Mr. PHIPPS. Why would it not be more fair?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator comes from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that in the city of Denver, which is the capital of Colorado, the value of the capitol grounds should be taken into consideration in ascertaining the taxes to be paid by the people of the city of Denver, and that the State of Colorado should pay upon the value of its capitol grounds to the city of Denver?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator, Mr. President, that in case the State of Colorado should invite the Federal Government to move its National Capital to Colorado, as has been suggested, Colorado would say, "Yes; we are glad to have you, but if you are going to have the officials and employees of the different Federal departments located here you must expect to provide homes and proper facilities for them." You would not find a State offering to carry the entire burden; that would be unreasonable.

Mr. LENROOT. What is the difference between a State Capital and the National Capital, except relatively?

Mr. PHIPPS. The difference between a State Capital and the National Capital is that a State capital is to a great extent a mere incident. The location of a State capitol in a given city involves, perhaps, the acquisition of no more than from 1½ to 4 acres of ground, even in the largest State capital in the United States. The State capitals have manufacturing and other industries. The Federal Capital is not intended as a manufacturing center and is not maintained for any such purpose.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from Colorado think that the ownership by the Government of property and the activities of the Government are a burden and a hardship upon the people of the District of Columbia?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think when the Federal Government brings employees here by the thousands it must expect to do more for them than if it were an ordinary city.

Mr. LENROOT. No, no; the Senator will please answer my question. Does he think the Government activities in the District of Columbia are an injustice and a hardship upon the people of the District of Columbia?

Mr. PHIPPS. Of course the answer to that question is, No.

Mr. LENROOT. What would the property here be worth if it were not for those activities? It would be worth about $20 an acre.

Mr. PHIPPS. What would it cost to keep it up? It is the cost of maintenance that makes taxation necessary.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is not the mere existence of a city.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not for an instant suggest that the people of the District of Columbia should pay all that it costs to maintain the city of Washington. We ought to make the city of Washington the most beautiful place in the world, and it ought to cost a great deal more to maintain the city of Washington than it costs to maintain any other city of like size anywhere in the United States, and the Treasury should foot that difference and pay it, and pay it willingly. On the other hand, those who come here to the District, whatever their purpose may be, ought to be willing and should be compelled to pay their fair share of taxes, and no one should complain here if he is not compelled to pay any more here in the District of Columbia than taxpayers are compelled to pay in other cities of like population. Then, beyond that, we ought to be liberal in appropriations, and we ought not to be either limited, upon the one hand, by any 50-50 proposition, nor, upon the other hand, should we be compelled to contribute 50 per cent irrespective of the needs of the District.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I do not know that the Senator really meant that last statement—"compelled to contribute 50 per cent irrespective of the needs of the District." It seemed to me that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] made a very definite explanation of the manner in which these surpluses arose. Perhaps it was not quite convincing to the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin, but, if I may have a moment, I should like to put it in this form:

We will say that for the year 1920 the estimate for the District is $10,000,000, and that for the Federal Government $10,000,000, regardless of whether it was 60-40 or not. The committees, when they come to round out the bill, make the bill $18,000,000. The Federal Government pays in only the $9,000,000. The District pays $9,000,000, it is true, on account of those expenditures, but the surplus of a million dollars of taxation which it has collected goes into the Treasury of the United States. As to those accumulations that have gone on year by year, you have the Members of the House claiming that that money belongs to the Federal Government, and refusing to have it used for the purpose of applying against the taxation of following years. The purpose of the Jones bill is to correct that unfair and unjust proposition on the part of Congress, and I hope the Members of the Senate will so see it.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator from Colorado a question. If the taxation that produces the $10,000,000 is not any more than a fair rate of taxation, is not any more than the taxpayers here should justly pay, considering other cities, why should they have the benefit of that in a subsequent year?

Mr. PHIPPS. Why should they not? They contributed it as taxation for the purpose of carrying on the activities of the local government, for providing public schools, for paving streets, and for other purposes. Why should it not be expended in following years? Why should it remain in the Treasury of the United States, and, if finally covered in, reduce the Government's contribution by that amount?

Mr. LENROOT. Why should the Government contribute any more than is necessary to make up the deficit after a reasonable rate has been imposed? That is my question, and that is what I have failed to get an answer to.

Mr. PHIPPS. The question of a reasonable and fair rate is a moot question, and it is one on which we do not agree. The Senator thinks that 50-50 is not fair to the Federal Government. With all the study I have been able to give it since I have been here, I think it is.

Mr. LENROOT. What does the Senator base his 50-50 proposition upon? I should like to know what reasonable ground there is for it. Why does the Senator say that the Government should contribute just 50 per cent, and not 45 per cent or 55 per cent?

Mr. PHIPPS. Probably for the opposite of the reason that the Senator says it should be 60-40.

Mr. LENROOT. I have not said that.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator is making an argument along those lines.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, with respect to the surplus, how does the Senator arrive at the conclusion that the surplus is composed of revenue derived from the taxation of property in the District?

Mr. PHIPPS. Because it comes from no other source whatever. No Government money is paid excepting that which goes directly to the liquidation of the expenditures incurred.

Mr. GLASS. Say, for example, that $9,000,000 of Government funds is appropriated, and $9,000,000 assigned to the District of Columbia to be derived from taxation.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Is the entire $9,000,000 appropriated by the Government used?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; it is.

Mr. GLASS. Then, how do you arrive at the conclusion that the $1,000,000 carried to surplus is totally derived from local taxation?

Mr. PHIPPS. Because the rate of local taxation was based on a figure that would raise $10,000,000, and the $10,000,000 was raised and paid into the Treasury; but the appropriation for the District was only $9,000,000, one-half of the $18,000,000 carried by the bill. Therefore there remained a surplus of a million dollars.

Mr. GLASS. But the example cited by the Senator was that of a total revenue of $18,000,000.

Mr. PHIPPS. No; I beg the Senator's pardon—a total appropriation of $18,000,000, of which the Government was to pay one-half and the District one-half.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. PHIPPS. The taxation raised by the District was $10,000,000, or $1,000,000 more than the amount required to pay its half of the total appropriation, and therefore that million dollars remained as a balance. That is merely illustrating in round figures the fact that during the past few years those surpluses have accumulated year by year until, as said by the Senator from Kansas, they exceed $4,000,000 to-day in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GLASS. In other words, the fund derived from taxation as the District's share was, we will say, a million dollars more than was appropriated by Congress as the Government's share?

Mr. PHIPPS. It would average about that over a four-year period.

Mr. GLASS. Then, I would say that that fund belongs to the District of Columbia.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is our contention; but the contention of the House is that that $4,000,000 belongs to the Federal Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, of course the result of this, as is desired by the Senator from Colorado and as will be proposed by this bill, is this:

Take the illustration that the Senator gives. He will correct me if I have not understood him correctly. We will say that there is $10,000,000 raised by taxation. There is $18,000,000 appropriated, leaving a million dollars surplus. The Senator would have that million dollars deducted the next year from the amount to be raised by taxation, irrespective of the fact that the $10,000,000 that was raised by taxation was no more than the taxpayers reasonably ought to pay for the benefits they enjoy here in the District.

Mr. KING. Less than what they reasonably ought to pay.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the proposition.

Mr. GLASS. How do you arrive at what the taxpayers of the District of Columbia reasonably ought to pay?

Mr. LENROOT. I think they ought to pay here in the District the average rate, as nearly as it can be ascertained, that they would pay anywhere in the United States under like circumstances.

Mr. GLASS. But what I want to know is, how are you going to adjust the rate of taxation to the requirements of the District of Columbia? When you apply a rate of taxation to any given community it is the rate of taxation required for the necessities of that particular community.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. Then I would have paid out of the Federal Treasury all that is necessary beyond that, whether it is 50 per cent or 60 per cent or 30 per cent.

Mr. GLASS. But there would be nothing beyond that if you applied to the property owners of the District of Columbia the tax rate necessary to meet the necessities of the District.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; I did not say the tax rate necessary to meet the necessities of the District. I say that if, for instance, the average throughout the United States of cities of 500,000 people is 1½ or 2 per cent upon the full value of the property—and that can easily be ascertained—that should be the fixed rate here upon realty in the city of Washington.

Mr. GLASS. Suppose that rate should meet all of the requirements of the District of Columbia?

Mr. LENROOT. Then there is no reason in the world why any money should be paid out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. GLASS. That is what I sought to draw from the Senator. The proposition is, if the District should raise it all, then there would be no obligation upon the Government of the United States to supply a dollar.

Mr. LENROOT. Not a dollar.

Mr. KING. That is my contention, too.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in addition to that, it can not be denied that Washington has become the haven and the refuge of people from all over the United States, one of the purposes—I do not say the main purpose, but one of the inducements—being that their taxes will be less here in the District of Columbia than elsewhere; and it seems to me that before we attempt to make permanent this arbitrary 50-50 proposition, at least we should apply here in the District the system of taxation that is being applied in other States. There ought to be an inheritance tax. This ought not to be a place—the only place, I believe, in the United States to-day—where a man can move with his family and feel that when he dies there will be no local inheritance tax to pay. There ought to be a reasonable income tax, similar to that which is imposed by the States, in addition to the Federal income tax.

In other words, the man who lives here in Washington, getting the privileges that he does in the way of Government activities and what the Government furnishes for his pleasure and his comfort, ought not to enjoy an advantage here in the way of taxation. All I ask is that those matters be equalized, that men should be called upon to pay as much here as elsewhere. If it is 1½ per cent, as proposed in this bill, I am content.

People talk about the difficulties of ascertaining it. In my State we have a State tax commission whose duty it is under the law to ascertain, for the purpose of fixing a rate of taxation upon railroads, the average taxation of the State, based upon the full value of the property. It does it every year. It does it to the satisfaction of the public and the railroads, and there is not the slightest difficulty about it. So a commission could ascertain the average rate of taxation in half a dozen or a dozen cities comparable to Washington in population and fix it as the rate of taxation for the District of Columbia. If it is 1½ per cent, let it stand at 1½ per cent; if it is 1¾ per cent, make it 1¾ per cent; and then let Congress appropriate whatever is necessary to make up the difference, whatever it may be, whether it be more than 50 per cent or whether it be less than 50 per cent.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to suggest to him a proposed amendment for his consideration, if he cares to have me do so.

Taking the bill as offered, let this part of the language stand, "that the general expenses of the District of Columbia shall be chargeable to and paid out of the Treasury of the United States." Then, after the word "States," in line 5, page 1, strike out all the balance and insert the following as section 2:

> The rate of taxation in the District of Columbia shall be fair and reasonable, and the revenues thus derived shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

That would obviate all the difficulty the Senator from Kansas referred to about surplusage. They simply put their money into the Treasury, and out of the Treasury come all the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia. It takes care of every other suggestion in the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. How would the rate be ascertained?

Mr. CARAWAY. Congress, of course, will have to fix the rate. I understood the Senator from Washington wanted to fix some definite means by which we could proceed, and the position of the Senator from Wisconsin is, as I understood him—and I thoroughly agree with him as I understood him—that the people of the District of Columbia should pay a fair and a reasonable tax, and then the Government should pay the difference. The bill then would provide that the expenses of the District of Columbia should be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and section 2 would provide that—

The rate of taxation in the District of Columbia shall be fair and reasonable, and the revenues thus derived shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. LENROOT. The difficulty I see with that is in fixing the rate. I am frank to say that I would rather fix the rate in the bill at one and a half, just as it is, and get the correct principle adopted, and let the one and a half stand until we can get an ascertainment of what is a fair average rate.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is a tentative amendment I have suggested for the consideration of the Senate. I should not object if we provide that the rate of taxation shall be as now provided in the law, until we change it.

Mr. LENROOT. That would establish the correct principle. I do not desire to seek to increase the taxes in the District of Columbia, unless they ought to be increased, and that only upon a fair, impartial investigation; but there is no foundation that can be based in logic for this 50–50 proposition. It ought to be done away with, and the same is true of the 60–40 proposition. That is not any more logical than the other.

The Senator from Kansas has intimated that Congress will not make the necessary appropriations for the District of Columbia unless this 50–50 proposition be adopted, but I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas—who knows it even better than I—to the fact that as long as we have had this 50–50 proposition, there has been constant complaint here in the District of Columbia that we have not made sufficient appropriations, and I do not think that this will have anything to do with that question one way or the other.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have been on the District subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee for many years, and I never heard any serious complaint about the amount appropriated until about three or four years ago. In other words, the commissioners seemed to be well satisfied up to that time, and that was when the surplus commenced to accumulate.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator has been on the Committee on Appropriations, and I ask the Senator if he has found any opposition here on the floor of the Senate to appropriations made for the District of Columbia?

Mr. CURTIS. I would have to say yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not remember it.

Mr. CURTIS. We have sometimes had pretty hard fights here over the bill. Before I became chairman of the subcommittee I remember that we used to take about three weeks to pass the bill. I think the two times I have handled the bill, one time we passed it in 45 minutes and the other time in a day and a half.

Mr. LENROOT. Whenever the Senator from Kansas has handled the bill it has gone through very rapidly.

Mr. CURTIS. I am not throwing any bouquets at myself——

Mr. LENROOT. It is a fact.

Mr. CURTIS. I am simply stating that to show the Senator that there has at times been some opposition. I remember once it took three weeks to pass the bill. I remember the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Gallinger, was once taken sick, about eight years ago, and I was asked to take charge of the bill, and we were at least a week passing it.

Mr. LENROOT. I remember when there was controversy over the District bill, but I never heard of any controversy over the items in the District bill with reference to schools and other absolutely necessary things for the District. I do know of a great deal of controversy over items in the bill with reference to acquiring property, where there was more or less suspicion as to who the beneficiaries of such action might be.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator is right. I do not remember of any particular opposition as to schools, but there was in one of the Congresses quite a fight on the schools.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator knows there were quarrels between real estate men here in the city of Washington that did bring on such contests.

Mr. CURTIS. I state for the committee that during the last four years we have refused to let the real estate men of this District come before our committee to be heard.

Mr. LENROOT. There has not been the contest in the last few years.

Mr. KING. The Senator is referring to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CURTIS. The Subcommittee on Appropriations has refused to hear the real estate dealers of the District of Columbia, and we have passed upon the District appropriation bills upon the record as we could get it and our own information. We called in the people we believed knew about the conditions, and if they did not have the information we have made them get it for us or we have gotten it for ourselves.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas if it is not true that we provide in these bills where the money shall be spent, on what streets, and so on?

Mr. CURTIS. That is true, except that there is a fund for general repairs, which may be used by the District Commissioners in their discretion, but usually Congress designates where the money shall be used or what streets shall be paved and that certain others shall be repaired. There is a general fund out of which the commissioners may repair those which they think most need it under certain circumstances.

Mr. KING. The designation of the places where the money should be spent has been made as the result of testimony which came before the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not like to take up so much of the time of the Senate, but the members of the committee in the last four years have made it their practice to go over all the streets and determine for themselves, after looking over the various sections, what streets should be improved.

Mr. DIAL. Would it not be well to leave that to the commissioners? Congressmen are very busy, and do not have time to study all those things out.

Mr. CURTIS. The committee took time to do it. Last year I think every member of the subcommittee went out; that is my recollection.

Mr. DIAL. The reason I asked the question was to develop the fact that a short time ago I viewed a great development on the edge of the town, and it seemed to me to be much finer and more expensive than the surroundings required, and perhaps the city would have been better off if that money had been otherwise expended.

Mr. CURTIS. I judge the money referred to was used out of the general fund. The subcommittee made no recommendation, unless they were certain that the improvements were actually needed.

Mr. CARAWAY. I suggest for the consideration of the Senator from Wisconsin as an addition to the amendment that there be added section 3, to read as follows:

Until otherwise provided by law the rate of taxation shall be as now existing.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that would be a very desirable amendment to make.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I suggest, then, what the amendment would be if the bill were passed?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. First:

That the general expenses of the District of Columbia shall be chargeable to and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Then strike out all the remainder of the bill and insert:

SEC. 2. The rate of taxation in the District of Columbia shall be fair and reasonable, and the revenues thus derived shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 3. Until otherwise provided by law, the rate of taxation shall be as now provided.

That would be the way the bill would read.

Mr. GLASS. That would not increase the sources of taxation in any respect. What is to become of the personal property and securities now exempt? What is to become of the objection raised by the Senator from Wisconsin that there is no local income tax and no inheritance tax?

Mr. CARAWAY. That would all be a question for Congress. If it proceeded to fix the rates of taxation, all those questions would be taken care of. I think, myself, the Senator from Wisconsin is entirely correct in saying that we ought to have an inheritance tax and an income tax in the District of Columbia, as they have in Virginia, and it merely fixes a workable basis until Congress shall have disposed of the question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, from the questions propounded by the Senator from Virginia, as well as the general discussion, that this bill is premature, as well as being exceedingly imperfect. It establishes no principle. It does not determine the character of taxation. It does not determine whether we shall have an income tax or an estate tax, or what not. It leaves those questions for future determination. It merely provides that the District shall only pay 50 per cent of the burdens of running the District of Columbia, and then it leaves it for future legislation to determine how the taxes which the District shall pay are to be raised.

It does seem to me that we ought to pass a comprehensive taxation bill, providing a reasonable inheritance tax or estate tax, a reasonable income tax, and a fair and just method of assessing the value of property in the District, and fixing a reasonable rate, such as obtains in progressive cities of the United States which receive such advantages, or approximately the advantages, because none receive as great as are enjoyed by the inhabitants of this District; and then provide that after assessing the property along those lines, and obtaining that amount of revenue, whatever deficit results the Treasury of the United States shall be called upon to meet.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Utah, and if this bill does not pass the Senate, I am very confident that the committee will take this matter in charge, and, I hope, will present to the Senate a comprehensive bill, based upon some sound principles, which this bill clearly is not.

I call attention to another feature with reference to taxation, what is known as the Borland Act, which passed a few years ago, assessing to the abutting property part of the cost of paving and street improvements. There is very great opposition to that here in the District of Columbia. Citizens' asssociations are passing resolutions for the repeal of it. Under it the taxpayer in Washington is compelled to pay 50 per cent of the cost of the paving upon half of the street abutting his property. They are objecting to that.

In the city of Superior, where I live, we pay every dollar of the cost of such improvements under what are known as special assessments, and nearly every State of the Union imposes upon the abutting owner every dollar of such cost, and that is reflected, I say to the Senator from Washington, in the rate of taxation here, while it is excluded in all the rates you get from other cities, because it is not included in the general tax rate at all. That is another advantage citizens here have. Yet they are trying to accomplish the repeal of that act.

The only possible thing which can be urged against the proposition which I have made, that a fair rate should be imposed upon the District and that Congress should make up the difference, whatever it is, is that stated by the Senator from Kansas, that under such a system Congress will not appropriate the moneys which ought to be appropriated to make Washington what it ought to be.

If that is true, it will be the fault of his own committee, because the Senate will pass, as the Senate has passed ever since I have been a Member of this body, anything for the District of Columbia which the Committee on Appropriations is willing to give to them, and I believe that in all time to come Senators and Members of the House will have such pride in the city of Washington that they will be much freer to vote whatever ought to be voted out of the Treasury of the United States when they feel that the citizens are paying their fair share than a share, under this present system, which is so unsatisfactory to so large a percentage of the House and of the Senate.

I believe that in the interest of the District itself, in the interest of the two Houses getting together, this bill should not pass. If it does pass, in my judgment it will only increase the distance between the two Houses; it will only accentuate the differences between them. I am satisfied that the House will never agree to this 50-50 proposition, and to pass it now, in the face of the agreement which has been made for this current year, I say to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], both of them on the Appropriations Committee, that if this is passed it will cause trouble, in my judgment, in the next appropriation bill, and they will not get any further in what they seek to accomplish than if the bill is killed, as I think it ought to be.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the discussion which has taken place, I feel sure that Senators desire further time to consider this measure, and I believe that the District Committee will be glad to consider it further. I therefore move that the bill be recommitted to the District Committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, if the Senate goes into executive session now, the bill which has just been under consideration will remain the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, pending the motion of the Senator from Kansas, I desire to ask the Senator if he will yield to me to report a resolution and two bills, for the consideration of which I desire to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall make no objection, with the understanding that the pending bill will not be displaced. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 13, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, Thy mercy is like the fullness of the sea and Thy truth is from everlasting to everlasting. In the light of these revelations teach us the deep things of the soul. Spirit Divine, ever persuade us to practice the virtue of obedience and to seek the mission of sacrifice. O give us the power to touch the world and yet remain unspotted; tempted and tried yet without blame or fault. As we venture along with our fellows help us to be rich in spirit, generous in service, and wise in our counsel, and at the last may we behold the King in His beauty. In the name of Jesus the Savior of the world. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had concurred in the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 34.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 60,000 additional copies of Public Law No. 98, known as the revenue law of 1921, of which 10,000 shall be for the Senate, 44,000 shall be for the House, 1,000 shall be for the Senate document room, 2,000 for the House document room, 1,000 for the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and 2,000 for the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, had insisted upon its amendments, had asked a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. GLASS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 8744) granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn., in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. MCKELLAR members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Civil Service Commission.

DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the deficiency bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference on the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. And I wish to add to that that I may be permitted to file a report before midnight to-night, because it is important that this bill should be the law before the 15th, or the War Risk Bureau will not have money with which to operate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, inasmuch as I have asked and have not found anyone who does know, what is the nature of the amendments?

Mr. MADDEN. They add about $3,000,000 to the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Are there many of them?

Mr. MADDEN. Only a few—five or six. One is for hospitalization, and another one is, I think, for the payment of some awards made by the Court of Claims and by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did I understand that the Senate asked for the conference?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if one of the amendments diverts the unexpended balance of the War Minerals Relief Association?

Mr. MADDEN. It does not; or it will not get through if it does.

Mr. WINGO. My understanding was that it was made available to pay war contract claims, which would include all of it.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that is one of the things that our committee has been very solicitous about, and I think we have adjusted it.

Mr. WINGO. I think the gentleman sees the difficulty.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the amendment applies to unexpended balances in the War Department.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it covers other balances, but I think we have that all right.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman sees the merit there?

Mr. MADDEN. There will not be anything of that sort when this comes back.

The Speaker announced the following conferees:

Mr. MADDEN, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that in case the conferees come to an agreement the report can be printed at any time up to midnight to-night. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report and accompanying statement are as follows:

JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICUTURAL INQUIRY.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 38.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for the completion of the investigation by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, created by a Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and the filing of the report to Congress therein directed to be made, be, and the same is hereby, extended to a date not later than the 15th of April, 1922.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, may I say that the resolution under which the committee proceeded was a very broad one. We divided the investigation into four parts, the first one dealing with the agricultural crisis and its causes; the second dealing particularly with credit, particularly agricultural credits; the third with transportation; and the fourth with marketing and distribution. The report dealing with the agricultural crisis and its causes should be issued Thursday; the one dealing with credits is in galley proof, and, we think, will be issued before the Christmas recess. The third, dealing with transportation, and the fourth with marketing and distribution, are in the process of analysis, and it is a matter very largely of putting a great mass in the form of a report and getting an agreement as to the recommendation which the commission will make as to those particular phases of the investigation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Surely.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I had forgotten for the moment, but it is my best recollection that the resolution creating the commission conferred upon it the authority to recommend legislation?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; but not direct to the House, as I understand.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They can not report a bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when was this commission supposed to report?

Mr. ANDERSON. The original resolution was passed on June 7, as I now recall, and required the commission to report in 90 days, and the time was subsequently extended until the first Monday in January.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that the inquiry which is under way will take until April of next year before any conclusion can be reached?

Mr. ANDERSON. There will be conclusions as to the two parts of the investigation to which I referred. It is very difficult to estimate the time that it will take, for the reason, as the gentleman knows, that the members of the commission are Members of the House and of the Senate, and their time is more or less occupied with committee meetings and with Senate and House meetings, and after you have gotten the material entirely together, and have analyzed it and put it in the form of a report for the consideration of the commission, it will take considerable time to get a crystallization of views in order to make it possible to make a unanimous report. As a matter of fact, the two parts of this report which are about to be issued were in galley proof in October, and if it had not been for the other activities of the members of the commission those two parts might have been issued long before this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution 38.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for the completion of the investigation by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, created by a Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and the filing of the report to Congress therein directed to be made, be, and the same is hereby, extended to a date not later than the 15th of April, 1922.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a speech made by the Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY at Bridgeport, Conn., on December 7, on the American valuation features of the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the speech referred to delivered by Mr. FORDNEY. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the speech referred to:

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY AT BRIDGEPORT, CONN., ON DECEMBER 7, 1921.

In the time I have at my disposal here this evening it would be very difficult, indeed, to cover the tariff question and the numerous incidental considerations that have been presented to the Ways and Means Committee during the past year in connection with tariff legislation. The changed conditions abroad have brought forth many new lines of thought, and I have studied the question from every angle as thoroughly as my time and energy would permit. At the outset I want to state very definitely that nothing has occurred to weaken in the least my belief in the wisdom of the protective tariff policy. On the contrary, I am convinced that the enactment of a law that will adequately protect American producers against the importation of competitive products at less than the American cost of production is essential to industrial and business revival.

A most perplexing problem that has presented itself to the committee in its effort to draft a bill that will afford a reasonable degree of protection where protection is most needed results from the existing abnormal discrepancy in production costs in various foreign countries and our present practice of assessing ad valorem duties on foreign values. An ad valorem rate that would afford a reasonable degree of protection against one country under the present system on account of the variance in foreign values might afford no protection whatsoever against the importation of similar commodities from some other country. The committee early in its consideration of the tariff came to the conclusion that a change in the basis on which ad valorem rates are assessed must be adopted, and the committee very logically came to the conclusion that the only equitable basis for assessing ad valorem duties is the value of the commodity or of a comparable commodity in the American market, rather than the value of the imported merchandise in the country of origin.

To-night I shall endeavor to show the necessity for the so-called American valuation proposal. To do this, some brief general observations in regard to protection may be in order.

A study of the commercial progress of the principal nations of the world during the past half century clearly indicates the wisdom of a protective-tariff policy. From 1818 to 1865 Germany prospered under a protective system. In 1865 the free-trade thought prevailed and Germany abandoned the policy that had worked so satisfactorily. During the succeeding 14 years German industries suffered a very decided setback and the revenue of the German Empire was insufficient to meet expenditures. In 1879 Bismarck urged that Germany revert to customs-house legislation which had existed from 1818 to 1865. Among other things, Bismarck said in opening the debate in the Reichstag:

> Through the widely opened doors of its import trade the German market has become the mere storage space for the overproduction of other countries. * * * The success of the United States in material development is the most illustrious of modern times. The American Nation has not only successfully borne and suppressed the most gigantic and expensive war of all history but immediately afterwards disbanded its Army, found work for all its soldiers and marines, paid off most of its debt, gives labor and homes to all the unemployed of Europe as fast as they arrive within the territory, and all by a system of taxation so indirect as not to be perceived, much less felt. Because it is my deliberate judgment that the prosperity of America is mainly due to its system of protection laws, I urge that Germany has now reached that point where it is necessary to imitate the tariff system of the United States.

The Reichstag followed Bismarck's advice and the year 1879 marked the return of Germany to the policy of protection. The industrial and commercial progress of Germany from that date down to the beginning of the war is well known to all.

In urging the enactment of adequate tariff measures Bismarck said he based his opinion on practical experience—that the protective countries were prospering and the free-trade countries decaying. He predicted that England eventually would return to the protective policy, and would do so in order to keep at least her home market.

In this connection it is interesting to note that during the past year England enacted a bill placing substantial import duties on some 6,000 items. The legislation is entitled "Safeguarding of industries act, 1921." The rates became effective October 1.

Previous to the recent war we witnessed Germany with tariff barriers erected against such countries as Switzerland, where production costs and wages were less. Switzerland was looked upon then as a free-trade nation. As a result of the war and the collapse of Germany's monetary system, wages and production costs in Germany are now far less than in Switzerland, and Switzerland in an effort to preserve her home market is erecting tariff barriers against the flood of cheap imports from central Europe. Switzerland, close to the area where depreciated currency exists, is brought forcefully to realize the present urgent necessity for adequate import duties. Due to previous low tariff laws her present controversy is of special significance and interest. On September 11 the President of Switzerland delivered a lengthy address in defense of higher import duties. He stated the new tariff had become an urgent necessity, and the authorities were convinced that, due to the difference in production costs abroad and at home, the existing moderate rates did not give the slightest protection. Opponents to the Swiss tariff program have presented arguments from the standpoint of the consumer as distinguished from the producer, the same inconsistent argument with which we have to contend in the United States. President Schulthess's views on this point are well worth repeating.

Addressing himself to the consumer and to the workman as well he said:

> Do not forget that it is a great economic mistake to divide the people into producers and consumers. Everyone is a consumer, but he can only spend the income which he obtains directly or indirectly from the result of production or some secondary activity dependent on it. If you annihilate production you will strike the income and the consumer who cooperates with it, destroying the sources which give him living, and he will have nothing more to spend. The maintenance of production is a vital interest for everybody, and therefore the measures which favor it ought also to be understood and indorsed by everybody.

President Schulthess further said:

> The customs tariff is not a work of arbitrariness which owes its origin to personal ideas and fancies. It is the logical consequence of the present-day economic situation. It represents a situation which forces itself upon us, which was unavoidable. Other men than those who brought it forth would have reached the same result, after objectively weighing all circumstances, if they had been in responsible positions, even those who are leaders in the fight on the other side.

Switzerland, bordering on the countries of central Europe where currency values have so materially depreciated, is in a position to realize quickly the seriousness of the economic conditions prevailing in certain parts of the world to-day.

The countries of Europe one after the other are raising tariff barriers against the flood of cheap goods from central Europe.

I have a monthly report on the German market situation for November, 1921, written at Frankfort. It is significant, and I shall read a portion of it:

> The enormous depreciation to which the mark has been subject, especially during the last two months, has brought chaotic conditions into the prices of German merchandise. * * * The retail shops of Germany are being literally ransacked by the native population and by the many foreign visitors, who are coming to Germany owing to the cheapness of living and of goods. * * * The factories are working to full capacity and are booked up with orders for many months ahead.
> A great many novelties and new lines are being prepared in leather goods, jewelry, toys, china, and kindred lines, and designers, die makers, pattern makers, and toolmakers working overtime. Large cable repeat orders have reached Germany from America. An unusual number of foreign buyers are at present in this market taking advantage of the favorable rate of exchange. Large purchases are being made for American account in hosiery, china, toys, trimming, bead bags, notions, and linens. Exports to England and the colonies, Italy, Spain, Scandinavia, and Canada have increased. Exports to France and Switzerland are greatly curtailed by the high-tariff legislation and dullness of business in these countries.

A STABLE TARIFF LAW REQUIRES AD VALOREM RATES ON A STABLE BASIS.

When an ad valorem duty is assessed on an article the amount of duty in dollars and cents is determined by multiplying the rate by the value of the article. The value of the article has as much to do with the amount of duty to be paid as the rate itself. If either the rate or the value is variable the degree of protection will be variable. If either the rate or the value is beyond the control of Americans the amount of duty and the amount of protection will be beyond the control of Americans.

The inefficiency of assessing ad valorem duties on foreign values has been recognized for a century. Eighty years ago Henry Clay pointed out the weakness of the present system. He said:

> Now the valuation is made in foreign countries. We fix the duties and we leave to foreigners to assess the value on articles paying ad valorem duties. It is evident that the amount of duty payable on a given article subject to an ad valorem duty may be affected as much by the fixation of the value as by the specification of the duty, and for all practical purposes it would be just as safe to retain to ourselves the ascertainment of the value and leave to the foreigner to prescribe the duty as it is to reserve to ourselves the right to declare the duty and allow to him the privilege to assess the value.

ACCURATE INFORMATION REGARDING FOREIGN VALUES IS NOT OBTAINABLE.

Foreign countries resent inquiries and investigations on our part in regard to their manufacturing costs and selling prices. Our means of ascertaining the correctness of statements contained in importers' invoices regarding foreign values are meager at best. As a result, appraising officers rely largely on the importer's statements. The temptation to undervalue is most apparent.

As long ago as 1849 the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report declared that—> the facilities afforded to frauds upon the revenue are very great, and it is apprehended that such frauds have been and are habitually and extensively practiced.

In 1850 President Fillmore in his annual message referred to undervaluation as an existing evil and recommended—> that instead of taking the invoice of the article abroad as a means of determining its value here, the correctness of which invoice it is in many ways impossible to verify, the law be so changed as to require a home valuation or appraisal.

In his third message President Fillmore again criticized the assessing of ad valorem duties on foreign values and said that "legislation should never encourage dishonesty or crime." He explained that through undervaluation the dishonest importer would pay only a part of the duties which are paid by the honest importer, and thus indirectly receive from the Treasury of the United States a reward for his fraud and perjury.

In 1882 Assistant Secretary French, of the Treasury Department, recommended the adoption of home valuation, and in 1912 an appraisement commission appointed by Secretary MacVeagh made an exhaustive report, finding that many instances had been revealed where private invoices had been falsely fabricated for the purpose of deceiving appraising officers. That commission referred to undervaluation as a systematic and continuous fraud, and stated that—> with the element of interest always operative to conceal the truth from the investigator, whose means of ascertainment are at best feeble, the difficulty of definitely ascertaining true market values is glaringly plain.

Assessing ad valorem duties on production costs in America, where accurate information is obtainable, will obviate the necessity of relying on the importer's invoice. It will remove the premium which now exists on dishonesty and will save the honest merchant from the unfair competition of unscrupulous importers with which he must contend under the present practice of assessing duties on foreign values.

A further argument against foreign valuation is that it affords the least degree of protection when protection is most needed. If prices abroad are high, the necessity for tariff protection is at a minimum, but when prices abroad decline the danger to American industries and the need of adequate import duties correspondingly increase. An ad valorem rate on foreign value operates in such a way that the amount of protection varies directly with the increasing or decreasing foreign prices.

Why should a higher rate of duty be assessed upon an article imported from England than is assessed upon a similar article imported from Germany, Poland, or Czechoslovakia? How glaringly unfair it would be if local taxes were assessed in this manner. Suppose two farmers owned adjoining tracts of land similar in acreage and in value. Let us assume that one of them acquired his as a result of a forced sale at one-half its real value, and that the other farmer paid the full market value for his land. Would it be at all equitable to value one for the purpose of taxation at $5,000 and value the other at $10,000?

However, that is substantially the manner in which duties are assessed on imports. The importer states the purchase price or foreign value, and the appraising officer, generally speaking, accepts the value set forth in the invoice. There is a wide discrepancy in foreign values, resulting in a wide range of import duties paid. The system is void of logic or fairness and opens the door to frauds upon the Treasury through willful undervaluations.

If we are to have a stable tariff law, we must have a stable basis for the assessment of ad valorem duties. Conditions abroad at the present time are extremely abnormal. Price fluctuations are very violent and discrepancies in prices in the various countries are perhaps greater than at any time during the history of this Nation. The inequalities resulting from imposing ad valorem duties on foreign values are doubly apparent at this time. The present system must be changed, for under its operation duties will be prohibitive where protection is least required, and where protection is most needed the duties collected will be the smallest and will afford no protection whatever.

Not long ago an importer came to my office at Washington and stated that he had just returned from central Europe, and had found prices in certain portions of Poland, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Germany so low in American money they amounted to practically nothing. In school we are taught that if we multiply zero by a number, no matter how large that number may be, the result is zero. To determine the amount of duty to be collected on an importation, the value of the article is multiplied by the ad valorem rate. When the foreign value approaches the zero point the amount of protection is mighty near nothing, no matter how high the ad valorem rate may be.

Recently my attention was called to an invoice covering bentwood chairs purchased in Czechoslovakia. The price stated on the invoice was 3,600 Polish marks per dozen. I do not know the rate of exchange which prevailed on the day the purchase was made, but I do know that on the day I saw that invoice 4,400 Polish marks could be purchased for $1. In other words, a dozen chairs could have been purchased for about 80 cents and the cost of a chair would have been about 7 cents. The import duty on chairs in the present law is 15 per cent of the foreign value. You would all agree with me, I believe, and especially if you were engaged in manufacturing bent-wood furniture, that protection was most needed against importations from Czechoslovakia.

This illustration serves to show the practical impossibility of fixing an ad valorem rate based on foreign values that will afford even a reasonable degree of protection where protection is most needed. The assessing of ad valorem duties on American values is logical and extremely equitable, and when an importer endeavors to show that an ad valorem duty of about 20 per cent on American values amounts to 150 per cent or more on the foreign value, about the only thing he proves is a tremendous discrepancy in prices here and abroad and the absolute necessity of abandoning foreign valuation as a basis if we are to have a tariff law that will protect American industries under the present world-wide chaotic conditions.

Importers and retailers who specialize in the handling of the products of foreign labor are very active in their opposition to the pending tariff legislation, and they have elected to make the American valuation proposal their point of attack. Every free-trade argument I have ever heard is predicated on some apparent fallacy, and the arguments advanced against the American valuation plan are not exceptions. Many statements which have been made by importers are inaccurate and altogether misleading. In contending that American valuation will increase prices to the consumer, I note that in every instance they base their argument on the assumption that the price in America will be the foreign price plus transportation charges plus import duties plus a very liberal and arbitrary profit to the inporter. To me there is something very un-American in the very basis of their argument. Their assumption that under adequate rates they will continue to dictate prices in the American market is one thing to which I most strenuously object.

The importers' argument seems to be that we must allow the importers a wide margin of profit and that the American manufacturers deserve no consideration. They say not one word in regard to the possible beneficial effect on prices of increased domestic production. Their propaganda—and I have read it—ignores the American producer as completely as though he did not exist. It ignores the benefits that accrue through the furnishing of employment to American labor. From beginning to end it broadly assumes that importers will and should fix prices in the American markets. Do you like this primary consideration of the importer—the man who peddles the product of the world's pauper labor in the American market? Do you like this secondary or entire lack of consideration of the American manufacturer—the man who furnishes employment to American labor and contributes directly and indirectly to the maintenance of our schools and other public institutions? If anyone must have an advantage in the American market, why not the domestic producer? I do not want the foreigner to name the price at which I must buy or sell. Under an adequate tariff law healthy domestic competition will regulate prices. It is fair to both consumer and producer. It means industrial activity with labor well employed. It spells prosperity for the Nation.

Opponents of tariff legislation resort to the argument that legislation by the United States will cause retaliation by other countries. Its purpose is to stir up ill feeling at a time when, in the interest of all, ill feeeling should not exist.

They would lead you to believe that America alone contemplates increased import duties. The necessity for tariff changes, however, has been recognized by nearly every principal nation, and the changes in some of the foreign tariff laws have been quite radical.

A recent report by the Department of Commerce clearly shows the general trend of foreign tariff legislation since the armistice to be toward higher rates. The reasons ascribed for such tariff advances are "depreciation of exchange, resulting in intensive competition from certain countries; the tendency toward economic self-sufficiency for national reasons; a general movement for tariff revision in order to meet new economic conditions; and a desire to increase revenue from customs."

The enactment by England of the "safeguarding of industries act, 1921," marks the absolute reversal of her traditional free-trade policy. That bill imposes very substantial protective rates on a long list of competitive articles. Certain other countries have made horizontal increases in existing tariff rates.

In Argentina, for instance, a flat increase of 20 per cent was provided for by executive decree July 6, 1920.

In Australia, on March 25, 1920, a revised tariff became effective having for its object, as officially stated, the protection of industries created or expanded during the war, as well as the encouragement of new industries calculated to increase the economic independence of the country and to bring about a fuller utilization of Australian natural resources.

The trend of tariff changes in Belgium has been in an upward direction, and in a tariff act passed June 10, 1920, provision was made to change the basis for ad valorem duties from the cost of the goods in the country of origin to the value at the time of their presentation for customs clearance.

Even in far-away British India tariff duties have been increased, and the desire to protect and promote domestic industries is very evident.

In February of this year Chile provided for horizontal increases of 50, 60, and 100 per cent of existing import duties.

France has effected quite radical tariff changes through rates previously existing by certain coefficients.

Italy has adopted a new tariff law, effective July 1, 1921, which law contained a system of coefficients similar to those in France. Italian import rates have been considerably raised and the new legislation provides for the computing of duties in gold lire, and the duties are thus subject to increases which correspond with prevailing rates of exchange when paid in paper.

Japanese tariff changes have been, for the most part, emergency measures aimed to aid in the upbuilding of new industries. In the law effective June 1, 1921, provision was made for the assessment of ad valorem duties on values at the time of customs clearance, and a considerable number of rates were changed from specific to ad valorem.

The necessity for tariff revision in the United States to me seems more apparent than in any of the countries I have enumerated. Wage scales and the standard of living are higher in America than in other countries and our currency has not depreciated in value. Under the existing tariff law competitive foreign goods are offered in the American market at far less than our cost of production, and the inevitable result has been to curtail manufacturing and increase unemployment. It seems shortsighted on the part of people here and abroad to urge upon the United States the retention of a policy which will interfere with our prosperity, for it is not difficult to show that adversity in this country will be reflected in other countries and that the United States will not be in a position to aid foreign countries unless our people are well employed and have money with which to buy. Happiness and employment go hand in hand and misery comes when one is deprived of the right to work. Tariff legislation now under consideration is not aimed at foreign countries. The one big purpose is to revive domestic industries. The United States does not deny other countries the right to change tariff rates, and we reserve to ourselves the right to work out our own tariff policy.

It should be interesting to those who desire to sell in the domestic market to note the recent decline in our imports. For the nine months ending September of last year imports amounted to $4,358,000,000. For the corresponding nine months of this year imports were but $1,872,000,000. Present imports, it is thus seen, amount to about 42 per cent of what they were one year ago. The decline in prices and the emergency tariff might be alleged to cause the decrease, but the decrease has not been confined at all to articles covered in the emergency act, and the falling off of imports seems out of proportion to the decline in prices. One year ago cargo space was not as readily obtainable as at present. Fewer foreign goods were then offered for sale. In spite of all this, however, the sales of foreign goods in the United States were nearly two and a half times as great as to-day. Upon studying the situation I can arrive at but one conclusion, and that is that the purchasing power of the American people has been very seriously diminished. The mere presence of gold in the United States is not conclusive evidence of general prosperity. Prosperity is dependent upon ready and constant circulation of money, and this is made possible only through industrial activity.

The immediate result of the enactment of tariff rates which will adequately protect domestic industries will be temporarily to reduce imports of competitive products, thus causing a resumption of our industries and the enhancing of our purchasing power, and with the purchasing power of this country restored a healthy increase of sales of foreign commodities in the domestic market will develop and the prosperity of the United States will be reflected upon other countries, especially upon Canada, our neighbor to the north. A healthy foreign trade, it seems to me, can not be predicated on industrial inactivity.

It is argued by some that we must buy from abroad if we expect to sell abroad, but a more important consideration from the standpoint of commerce is that the American people shall have employment and have money with which to buy.

It is argued by those interested in importing goods into the domestic market that tariff increases will increase costs of production in the United States and make it impossible for the United States to hold her trade in South America. They say that Europe will win our markets in South America. These same importers, however, contend that if we do not buy from Europe, Europe will not have money with which to pay her debts. Is this not inconsistent? In one breath the opponents say we must surrender markets to Europe, and in the next breath they say we must adopt a policy which will enable us to retain markets and to prevent Europe from extending her sales. If it is true that the United States must surrender some market to Europe, would it not be better to surrender South American trade than to surrender the domestic market, which is by far the best market in the world for American-made goods? Some 90 per cent of all our products are marketed in the United States, while South America takes less than 1 per cent of what we produce. In a more or less uphill fight to extend the market now absorbing but 1 per cent of our production importers advocate a policy, the evident, inevitable result of which will be the surrender and ruinous impairment of the market for 90 per cent of what we have to sell.

I desire to call to your attention a portion of an article that appeared in an English newspaper on October 3, 1921. The paper is the London Morning Post. It sheds an important light on the propaganda in America in opposition to tariff legislation. The statement is as follows:

> The present position of the tariff is that it is held up for revision and will not come up again until January or February, 1922, and then, if at all, in a very modified form. In the meantime public opinion in America is steadily growing against the tariff. It is very important, the delegates say, that all industries in this country should examine the tariff closely and get in touch with the consumers of their goods in America, and should see that the propaganda that has been so successfully launched should not be allowed to die out.

As above stated, this article appeared on October 3. It refers to propaganda that the English have successfully launched. It urges that the propaganda should not be allowed to die out and predicts that tariff legislation has been held up, and if it comes up at all again will be brought up in a modified form. Practically all the opposition to the pending tariff bill can be readily traced to people financially interested in selling the product of foreign labor in the American market. They have resorted to all manner of arguments to carry their point.

The following is a portion of a letter sent out by Marshall Field & Co. to retailers:

> The American valuation plan in the Fordney tariff bill will prohibit our buying Europe's products that are to be assessed on an ad valorem basis.

I can not help but believe when Marshall Field & Co. used the word "prohibit" that they willfully make a statement which they know is not a fact. If Marshall Field & Co. had desired to be accurate, they could have said:

> The American valuation plan will make it less profitable for us to deal in Europe's products.

I have with me two knives sent me by a man in Chicago. One was picked up recently in Germany by a traveler. It cost the equivalent of 9.6 cents. The second knife was purchased in Marshall Field's store in Chicago, and the price paid was $5. Both knives were made by the firm of A. J. Henckle. Consider what the margin of profit must be on the knife imported by the firm of Marshall Field & Co. Marshall Field & Co. is not an eleemosynary institution. On the contrary, they are reported to be more or less supersensitive on the question of money making. They have been taking a leading part in opposing American valuation. In their newspaper advertisements they claim that their representatives are known in every country of the world. In their advertising they refer to their foreign organization. If they can purchase knives in Germany for 9 cents and sell them in Chicago for $5, are we assuming too much when we assert that their activity in opposing the pending tariff bill is prompted by selfish motives? Do you think an ad valorem duty assessed on the value of that German knife in America will be a prohibition against the importation of that cheap knife from Germany? Where the discrepancy is as great as appears in the case of those knives, American valuation may cut the importers' profit in half; but I state very firmly that such abnormal profits should be cut in half.

Where the foreign value and the American value do not differ materially, a duty based on the American value will not be materially higher than the duty based on the foreign value. In such a case added protection is not needed. Protection is needed where the great discrepancy in value exists, and with ad valorem duties assessed on American values the amount to be paid by the importer will be materially increased where foreign prices are abnormally high.

It should be recognized by all that the one desire of Congress is to enact a tariff law which will restore industrial activity in the United States and permit the standard of living to be maintained. The United States has many laws in the interest of labor which, however, add to the cost of production, and it would be preeminently unfair to our manufacturers who must comply with those laws to be placed in open competition with the product of foreign countries where such laws do not exist.

I refer to child-labor legislation and legislation affecting the hours of labor. I refer to minimum wage laws and to factory-inspection regulations, to the pure-food laws, and to legislation on the subject of employer's liability.

Wealth is created only by activity. A man out of work is a burden on the community. Unemployment in the United States will only tend to add to the difficulties of other countries, while our own prosperity will be reflected all over the world, and it is my very firm conviction that prosperity to this country can be restored only through the revision of existing tariff laws.

On October 31 the Daily News Record, of New York, carried an article entitled "Women oppose valuation in Fordney tariff bill." The article related solely to the possibility of advances in prices under American valuation. True to form, the author of the article completely ignored such a thing as domestic competition. The conclusions were all based on the assumption that the price asked by the importer on imported goods would control the American market. The article purported to show present retail prices and what they termed "Fordney retail prices," prices they claimed would prevail with the new valuation plan in force. On November 2 I received a letter from the Cleveland Woolen Mills, of Dresden, Ohio, criticizing the article in question of the Daily News Record. The following is a portion of what the president of the Cleveland Woolen Mills wrote me:

In looking over the article and the difference in prices, showing the advances the women have been led to believe will take place, I notice the fifth article is overcoating. The present retail price is stated as being $12.35 and the Fordney retail price $17.65. This is so misleading that I thought it best to call your attention to it, as we know something about overcoatings, as we make thousands of yards of it. About the rest of the list we know nothing, but if the overcoating question is anything to go by the whole list is ridiculous on the face of it.

I am taking the liberty of inclosing you two samples of overcoating that we have made very large quantities of this year, known as fancy plaid backs, we are selling to the garment manufacturers at less than $3 per yard, and if you can get anyone to produce anything better than this we would like to know it.

We do not want to bother you with a lot of detail, but thought you would be interested in seeing what American manufacturers are doing. It seems to me this overcoating is good enough for any man in the world to wear.

No doubt the importer was dealing in imported overcoatings because he could purchase them for less than the price asked by the American manufacturer. However, the consumer was not getting the benefit. No doubt the importer by claiming some superiority of foreign workmanship was able to exact a fancy price for the product of cheap foreign labor. Will the importer be able arbitrarily to advance his prices as he seems to assume? What about the competitive American-made commodity? With an adequate domestic supply, open and apparent to all, the opportunity for the middleman to profiteer is reduced to a minimum. American valuation will reduce the incentive to push foreign-made goods and will increase the market for goods "made in America." It will aid industry and furnish added employment to our labor.

In conclusion I can say in regard to the pending tariff legislation what the President of Switzerland so aptly said in regard to their tariff changes—that the tariff is not a work of arbitrariness which owes its origin to personal ideas and fancies, but is the logical consequence of the present-day economic situation. It represents a solution which forces itself upon us. Other men than those who brought it forth would have reached the same result after objectively weighing all circumstances if they had been in responsible positions, even those who are leaders in the fight on the other side.

The abject inability of American manufacturers to continue operations in the face of importations of competitive commodities at far less than the American cost of production is most apparent. I trust the tariff program will be expedited by all possible means at the session of Congress just opened and that foreign valuation, as a basis for the assessment of ad valorem duties, will be speedily placed in the discard, where it very fittingly belongs.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8744 and concur in the Senate amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota calls up the bill H. R. 8744. The Clerk will report it by title with the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8744) granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not recall another instance where the House has passed a bridge bill and the Senate has taken upon itself to add as an amendment an entirely distinct proposition. The House bill relates to a bridge over a nonnavigable stream known as the Red River of the North. No objection was raised to its passage here. It goes over to the Senate. The Senate has the nerve, for the first time in my legislative experience, to add an amendment entirely foreign to the subject matter under consideration, namely, the extension of time for the construction of a bridge over an entirely different stream, namely, over the Missouri, at Chamberlain.

It is within the province of the gentleman to take this bill from the Speaker's table and move to concur in the Senate amendments, and I would strenuously oppose it were it not for the fact that the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has recommended a bill providing for the extension of the time as embodied in the proposed amendment of the Senate. But I raise my voice in opposition to the practice. These bridge bills should not be loaded down by foreign matter pertaining to other bridges when the House has not had an opportunity to consider them. I think the practice is objectionable and should not be followed.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota for such explanation as he cares to give.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I notice that one of these amendments deals with the extension of time for the completion of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. railway bridge at Chamberlain, S. Dak. Now, there have been already at least three different extensions, and there has expired a period of not less than 15 years from the time the railroad company first was required to build this bridge. I would not seriously object to this amendment if the time were reduced to two years, but I certainly shall object to it in its present form.

I want to say in this connection that a bill has passed the Senate granting an extension of three years in which to complete the Chamberlain bridge, and it is now pigeonholed in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House. I saw the chairman of that committee a short time ago, and he advised me that no action would be taken on the matter until I had had an opportunity to present my views before the committee. This opportunity has not been afforded. The bill now presented is certainly a surprise, and I shall object to its being taken up in its present form and at this time. It is out of order, and under the long-established rules of the House ought not to be put on its passage without any consideration of its merits and without opportunity for amendment.

The right to construct a wagon bridge across the Red River of the North in North Dakota has no relation to the completion of the railroad bridge at Chamberlain, S. Dak., and ought not to be coupled with it for the sake of getting by in this House. It is unfair, as it does not permit of the consideration of the Chamberlain proposition on its merits.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have no desire that my bill shall be burdened with this additional legislation, but inasmuch as the amendment put on by the Senate is simply to extend the time in which a bridge can be completed, and that legislation has been passed by this Congress providing for the completion of such a bridge, allowing the building of the bridge, and inasmuch as a bill granting the same extension as is suggested by this amendment has already passed the Senate, and, if I am correctly informed, has already been approved of by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, I hold it as of small moment and a matter that I think might as well be disposed of at this time, although I agree absolutely with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the practice of adding an amendment of this sort by another House is not a good or proper practice.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is to be congratulated upon his alertness in this matter, and is to be congratulated also upon expressing himself plainly and squarely upon this proposition.

The condition which he and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] have set forth, namely, that there is a bill on the calendar pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce taking care of the matter by way of an amendment plainly obviates what otherwise might be a real objection. Nevertheless, I think it is eminently proper that there should be a protest against the practice, and if it should be repeated an emphatic objection raised. Of course, I assume that the other body did not know anything about a bill having been favorably reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and being on the House Calendar. But if they can begin taking bridge bills and adding one bridge in an entirely different place they can just as well add a dozen, and then a Member here can move to concur in the Senate amendments. I congratulate the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Would it be in order to move to amend to strike out section 2 of the bill relating to the bridge at Chamberlain?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to move to strike out. The House may refuse to concur in the Senate amendment. That would practically strike it out. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The question being taken, the Senate amendment was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the figure "2" and insert the figure "3."

The amendment was concurred in.

By unanimous consent the amendment to the title was concurred in.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay on the table S. 2588, which is the bill to provide for the extension of time for the construction of the bridge at Chamberlain, N. Dak.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to lay on the table S. 2588.

The motion was agreed to.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 8928, to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field service.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 8928, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers a motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana moves to strike out all of section 6, beginning on page 5, line 4, and ending on page 6, line 3.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LEHLBACH. I call for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to call attention——

Mr. LEHLBACH. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Was not the debate on this section and all amendments thereto closed yesterday?

Mr. LONDON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the present occupant of the chair was temporarily out of the chair at that time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New Jersey asked unanimous consent that the debate close in 10 minutes, and that was agreed to, and the 10 minutes were used, 5 minutes for and 5 against.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hardly think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] used the entire 10 minutes at his disposal.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. He did not have 10 minutes. He had only 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that he consumed the time allotted for debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] to strike out section 6.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. Increases in compensation shall be allowed only upon the attainment and maintenance of the appropriate efficiency ratings; to the next higher rate within the salary range of the grade; and not more than once a year: Provided, That in any case wherein a specific recommendation is made by the Bureau of the Budget and the Congress expressly appropriates the money therefor, an increase in compensation may be allowed at any time to any rate within the salary range of the grade. And for such appropriation by Congress this provision shall be sufficient authority.

Reductions in compensation and dismissals shall be made by heads of departments in all cases whenever the efficiency ratings warrant, as provided in section 9 herein, subject to the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH. Page 6, line 17, after the word "Commission," insert: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall modify or repeal any existing preference in appointment or reduction in the service of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines under any existing law or any Executive order now in force."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that any provision in this act would conflict with either existing law or the existing Executive order with regard to preference of service men, but at the request of the chairman of the legislative committee of the American Legion I have agreed to submit this amendment, and I think it should be adopted.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the reading of the amendment, I understood that it was to provide that nothing in the act or this particular section should affect the soldiers' preference in existing law. Is that the purpose of it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, I shall support that, but I am wondering what useful purpose it will serve under this administration. It will be nothing more than a French gesture, because this administration, so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, is absolutely ignoring the soldiers' preference. For illustration, there was a man who saw service overseas, who was in action—a valiant soldier. He passed one examination in the last administration and became a postmaster; but even though he served satisfactorily for a considerable time he was kicked out for political purposes and another examination held and another man put in. Does the gentleman from New Jersey contend that this administration, in the conduct of the affairs of the Post Office Department, pays any attention to the preference rights of the soldiers?

Mr. LEHLBACH. If I thought the gentleman was seeking information, I would be glad to answer him.

Mr. WINGO. I want to know if the gentleman contends that is true. The gentleman is presenting an amendment here with reference to the law, and I want to know if they are going to obey this amendment or are they going to do with reference to this as they are doing with reference to postmasters?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does this bill or any portion of it relate to the appointment of postmasters?

Mr. WINGO. No. As usual a Republican politician will evade the real issue. The charge is this, and it is supported by the record, that you are ignoring the soldiers' preference which Congress provided in the appointment of postmasters, and that charge can not be denied. It is not denied, but the contention is made—and, of course, there may be something to it—that the President has the right to appoint postmasters regardless of that if he sees fit. I simply wanted to know if this is merely a piece of buncombe for the benefit of the American Legion and whether or not you are going to live up to it or whether you are going to turn it down whenever a Republican boss in my State or any other State says he wants a Republican machine politician for postmaster, even though he did not serve overseas, and if you are going to put out a veteran who has rendered acceptable service?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is aware of the fact that under the previous administration, where the law did not make it mandatory to appoint an ex-soldier the department gave preference to him?

Mr. WINGO. It did so. As a matter of fact, the soldier preference went in favor of Republican ex-service men in my State. They were selected by President Wilson even though the Congressman of that district wanted a Democratic friend of his own. That was adhered to. But whenever a Republican ex-service man fails to get an indorsement of the Republican organization, however acceptable may have been his service in France, if he has not made a fight in the political trenches for the Republican organization, he falls by the wayside and is forgotten.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. KING. Can the gentleman state any other cases except in his district?

Mr. WINGO. I did not mention my district.

Mr. KING. The gentleman mentioned one lone instance where that occurred.

Mr. WINGO. Is not the gentleman aware of what is going on in the country?

Mr. KING. I am not aware of what is going on in the gentleman's district, and perhaps no one else in the United States.

Mr. WINGO. I am taking the whole of the United States, and I did not mention my district. I will ask the gentleman if in his State of Illinois that same thing is not going on.

Mr. KING. I am not aware of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I can give the gentleman two instances.

Mr. WINGO. Then the gentleman is woefully ignorant of what is going on, or he is not candid with the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for five minutes more, in order to satisfy the curiosity of these gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Now I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. I will give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] a specific instance in my district where three eligibles were on the list. There was, first, a Democrat, now postmaster; second, a Republican lady; and, third, a Republican lady. There was very little difference in the ratings of the two Republican ladies. Knowing that the Democratic candidate had no chance, I investigated as between the two Republican ladies. The second one is a young lady who has means of support. Upon the investigation I learned that the third is the wife of a disabled ex-service man. I appealed for her to this Postmaster General, or to his First Assistant. The two women were both loyal Republicans, and I asked them to decide, between these two Republican ladies, in favor of the wife of the disabled ex-service man. They informed me that there was nothing doing, because the second candidate had the support of the local political referee. I then took it up with him, and he answered that the second eligible was the selection and that no consideration could be given to my appeal for the wife of the disabled ex-soldier. I can cite other cases if you want more.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WINGO. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the question under discussion?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am an old-fashioned Methodist, so I will continue a little longer this experience meeting, because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] seems to be surprised at the information.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I received the eligible list after examination for a rural-route carrier. There was one soldier marked with a preference, and notwithstanding that, a younger man, a good Republican, was appointed rural mail carrier. I investigated it and found out the reason why. There was a Republican appointed who had been a former postmaster, who agreed to resign if they would appoint him, so as to make a vacancy for another good Republican. Consequently they kicked the ex-service man out, and he did not get a look-in, notwithstanding he was marked for preference in the list.

Mr. WINGO. Now, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the desire to get on with the bill. I am very fond of the gentleman from Illinois, and I will tell him how to get the information: Go down and call for the records. He need not confine it to Arkansas; he can go to Kentucky, and unless I am very much mistaken he can go down to Egypt, in Illinois, and he may find a few cases there. Now, to get back to the question. I venture to assert that there are 100 men here, many on the Republican side, who know of instances of this kind. They know that the claim of my good and genial friend, Mr. Hays—and I am very fond of him; I am always fond of political deacons—they know that the claim he has made in a magazine article that he was going to put postmaster appointments on a nonpartisan basis is absolute bunk, and he can not claim that he has made all the appointments on a nonpartisan basis. Not only does the Republican organization control the Post Office Department but they control the workings of the Civil Service Commission, and while a Republican politician who can not make over 45 on mathematics and accounts on a simple third-class post-office examination can get an appointment by having his grades revised; and not only do you control the Post Office Department but the Republican machine controls the Civil Service Commission, so that they revise the examinations, and one man on a revision of grades slips in on a two-tenths of 1 per cent and is appointed. They frankly admit down at the Post Office Department that H. L. Remmel, Republican chairman of Arkansas, controls appointments in that State, and I am surprised that my good friend, Mr. Hays, should try to fool the country into believing that he is conducting a nonpartisan administration of the Post Office Department. Why, he was put in charge of the Post Office Department because he was recognized as a past master of partisanship. I am not complaining about your being partisan in the appointments, but I am complaining about your hypocritical pretense that you are having a civil-service nonpartisan administration of the Post Office Department.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. KING. There is considerable truth in what the gentleman says, but the trouble is, if there is any criticism to be laid at the door of Mr. Hays, it is because he is following the policy adopted by Mr. Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. WINGO. I deny that. The record shows that President Woodrow Wilson in every State in the Union, and I measure my words, gave preference to soldiers, and he gave preference to Republicans under his order and appointed Republicans over the protest of Democrats because he lived up to the letter and spirit of his order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion to strike out the last word. Since it has been demonstrated that two Democratic Congressmen have been unable to dictate the action of the Post Office Department in the appointment of a postmaster and a rural carrier, I think it is time that we get back to the proposition before the House. That is the reason I asked the question whether there was anything in the bill which relates to the appointment of postmasters.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman tell the House what is in this amendment?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; I understand the amendment, and I do not think there is any doubt about the gentleman understanding the amendment. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether he does not think the word "further" should be stricken out where it occurs after the word "Provided."

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think both the words "Provided further" should be stricken out, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has an amendment which he purposes offering to that effect.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of the amendment the language "Provided further," and that the amendment shall be reported as a separate paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN to the amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: At the beginning of the amendment strike out the words "Provided further, That."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in lines 9 and 10, I move to strike out the word "expressly" and insert in lieu thereof the word "specifically."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 6, lines 9 and 10, strike out the word "expressly" and insert in lieu thereof the word "specifically."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in line 17, page 6, I move to strike out "the Civil Service Commission" and insert in lieu thereof "the Bureau of Efficiency."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 6, line 17, strike out the words "Civil Service Commission" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Bureau of Efficiency."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I direct the attention of the committee to the fact that the Civil Service Commission has no data at the present time from which to form any intelligent judgment as to what should be the compensation of employees, or the basis for their reduction, or for dismissals as provided in this paragraph. As the bill was originally drawn it was intended to create in the Civil Service Commission an instrumentality whereby they would obtain the same data and facts that are now in the possession of the Bureau of Efficiency. We have the Bureau of Efficiency. We vote them $125,000 annually for the collection of this very data. Yesterday the committee recognized the fact that the Bureau of Efficiency has this information, and authorized the heads of the departments to call upon the Civil Service Commission, if that commission had any information, and the Bureau of Efficiency. I then moved to strike out the Civil Service Commission, and the amendment was rejected. Some gentlemen claim that if the Civil Service Commission has some little information the heads of the departments should have it; but now by this provision it is sought to have accomplished the same work for which the Bureau of Efficiency is equipped and compel the Civil Service Commission to investigate into matters where now they have no data whatsoever. I stated yesterday that the Civil Service Commission had no data, has nothing on which to intelligently determine the proper salaries that should be paid to our Government employees. I also stated yesterday, in justification of my position, that the Bureau of Efficiency has been engaged in this work for several years past.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. This bill provides that the efficiency rating of each employee shall be kept in the office of the department and in the records of the Civil Service Commission. If that provision is followed out, it occurs to me that the logical agency to approve dismissal of the employee would be the agency where the efficiency rating is on file.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman recognize that the Bureau of Efficiency is equipped with all of the instrumentalities and facts for performing this function, and that if you now provide an additional agency, the Civil Service Commission, they will have to go ahead and duplicate the work at the expense of thousands and thousands of dollars?

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no. This bill provides that the efficiency rating of every employee shall be filed in the department where he serves and in the records of the Civil Service Commission. We would have to rewrite the bill in that particular if the gentleman's ideas were carried out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; you would not have to rewrite the bill. All that would be necessary—and I intend to follow it up—would be in section 9 to substitute the words "Bureau of Efficiency" for the words "Civil Service Commission."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is not this provision of the bill designed to prevent political dismissals?

The Civil Service Commission, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], which is not founded, I think, upon fact, acts in a nonpartisan way. It would be the tendency all the time, whatever administration comes in, if there is no check upon it, to rate a man according to political bias or prejudice and dismiss him. This check it gives to the Civil Service Commission, the authority to refuse a dismissal or reduction of a man because of his politics. That is the whole theory of the civil-service law.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not controvert what I said before, but, to answer directly the question put to me by the gentleman from Illinois, I wish to say that in the Post Office Department during the Democratic administration—and perhaps that will be used against the amendment I propose, it did not seem to have much consideration on the Democratic side yesterday—in the administration of this very thing in the Post Office Department there were no instances called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations when we went over the estimates, as far as clerical positions were concerned, of dismissals by reason of political affiliations.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I had a great many complaints myself, maybe because I was Republican leader of the House, because of dismissals for political reasons during the Wilson administration.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the Post Office Department?

Mr. MANN. From all departments of the Government, particularly the Post Office Department. Whether they were well founded or not, I do not know. I never thought it was my duty to undertake to determine those things. I do not wholly rely upon the information of a man when he is dismissed as to the reasons for the dismissal, but there ought to be a check, it seems to me, and the Civil Service Commission has been a check all the time as to dismissals for partisan purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This provision if adopted will merely mean a substitution of another agency where the Government has already such agency, and it will require a duplication of effort, and I do not think the Bureau of Efficiency will ever be utilized as a political means to discharge clerks or employees from the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is completely in error when he says that the Civil Service Commission has not the information nor the equipment to perform the functions which this paragraph and the supervision of the efficiency ratings upon which this paragraph depends, place upon it. The Bureau of Efficiency performs a very good work. It is vested with many and important functions in the making of this reclassification, and I would be the last to belittle the value of its services in the installation of this plan. But the Civil Service Commission is peculiarly the body which should supervise the installation of systems of efficiency, and it should be vested with the function that is prescribed in this particular section. In the first place, the Civil Service Commission has a detailed analysis of the duties to be performed by persons holding positions of every kind in the civil service. It has, furthermore, an analysis of the qualifications which are necessary in a person satisfactorily to perform those functions. It is upon that information that it bases all of its examinations.

Furthermore, under the retirement law the Civil Service Commission has a complete record of every single employee in the civil service from the time he enters the service until he is separated therefrom. It has in its archives the knowledge of each man's position, where he has been before, how long he has been in the service, and it has the complete analysis of what duties that man performs and the qualifications necessary to perform those duties. The Bureau of Efficiency in the past has dealt with broader problems, with the efficient functioning of the departments or of divisions or of bureaus, and has no information whatsoever, save that which it may have recently gathered, concerning individual employees and their individual duties. That is in the possession of the Civil Service Commission. To accept the amendment means to scrap the entire plant of the Civil Service Commission and force the Bureau of Efficiency de novo to build up this great mass of information.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. ELLIS. If I read this section right, you provide in the first instance in the beginning of the paragraph for increase of compensation. You propose to do that by use of the Bureau of the Budget, and then at the end of the paragraph——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is the gentleman referring to section 7?

Mr. ELLIS. To section 7—an increase in compensation you provide for, and then you say "That in any case wherein a specific recommendation is made by the Bureau of the Budget." I take it you contemplate that increase shall be upon the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no.

Mr. ELLIS. What does it mean? What is the recommendation?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The plan of classification classifies the entire personnel of the Government into a broad service and then divides it into various grades within each service. It provides a range of salaries for each grade, and it provides that advancements may be made from time to time when they are earned by the employees having maintained such degree of efficiency as would entitle them to an advance in pay.

And that is made in accordance with the efficiency systems which are provided for later in the bill. It also provides that reductions in pay and dismissals for lack of efficiency shall be under the general supervision of the Civil Service Commission, that has the information. It does provide for where there is a single exceptional instance, where it is necessary either for the good of the service to retain an employee or better his position, and it ought to carry with it a specific compensation not provided for in the general classification, that if the Bureau of the Budget recommends it to Congress, and Congress specifically appropriates the money for it, then such salary may be established, whether it comes within the broad classification or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not so much interested in the particular amendment now under consideration as I am in some other matters connected with this bill. Perhaps I may not have an opportunity later to state what

I would like concerning this measure, so avail myself of this opportunity to make a few observations relative to this bill. I favor this legislation—that is, I want to favor it, and will favor it if it can be amended to conform to my ideas of what it should be. On yesterday the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out subsection 1 of section 6 was defeated. Unless that subsection is stricken out of this bill I can not support it, and if there is a motion made to recommit this bill I shall vote to recommit the bill to strike out that section. I want to call the attention of the membership of this committee to the fact that if that provision is left in this bill it automatically increases the salary of every Government employee now drawing a salary of less than $2,500 from the Government, and this is no time to make a permanent increase, when we should be voting to make decreases instead of increases of these salaries. I wanted to call the attention of the membership of the committee to that fact, because I wished to explain why I shall vote against it, if I do vote against it.

Diverting now from the bill and answering the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], who spoke a moment ago, to the effect that the Civil Service Commission was under the domination and control of the party now in power, I can cite to him one concrete instance and example which disproves, to my mind at least, his assertion—an incident of which I have personal knowledge.

The Civil Service Commission in grading the applicants for a postmastership in a town in my district gave the present Democratic postmaster a rating of 90 out of a possible 100 on his "business experience." His business experience, to my personal knowledge, consisted of his having been a country school-teacher, a postmaster, and running a livery stable. His estimable wife was given a rating on her business experience of 84, and her experience consisted of having been assistant postmaster and a country school-teacher. A gentleman who took the examination right along with these two estimable people, who had had 20 years' business experience at the head of an important business concern situated in that town, and who was its active head and assistant manager, holding a position that required executive ability and tact in dealing with the public with a business concern doing an annual business of approximately $40,000 or $50,000 a year, coming in contact daily for more than 20 years with the people there, was given a rating of 74 on his business experience. He was the Republican on the list. Such inequalities as that and such impracticable methods of rating as that upon the part of the Civil Service Commission convinces me that the present party in power is not controlling their actions, and if I had my say about it the Civil Service Commission would be abolished entirely, so far as postmaster examinations are concerned or involved.

Mr. WINGO. Did the gentleman ask the Civil Service Commission to regrade the Republican?

Mr. ROACH. I certainly did, and they certainly did not raise his grade.

Mr. WINGO. Did they refuse to do it?

Mr. ROACH. They pretended to review it, but, in my opinion, they never did, as a matter of fact, review it, or they would have raised his grade on his business experience accordingly.

Mr. LAYTON. In other words, if you will permit me, your personal experience proves that the Civil Service Commission——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one moment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. LAYTON. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH] be extended for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAYTON. The result of your experience, I take it, is this, that you found the Civil Service Commission was not partisan, but was inefficient?

Mr. ROACH. Not only inefficient but some Members on this side believe that, after all, our minority friends over there have their friends in the commission who are "slipping the chunks" under us on this side.

Mr. WINGO. Which one got the appointment?

Mr. ROACH. The gentleman's wife was appointed by me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes' extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROACH. I wanted to cite this personal instance in order to disprove the remarks just made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] that the Civil Service Commission was being dominated and controlled by the party now in power. Such has not been my personal experience. I used all the influence I had and all the power that I had with the department heads to change such nonsensical rules and impracticable rating as they were applying over there, but I have not been successful.

Mr. WINGO. Will the Civil Service Commission, at the request of Republican chairmen in a Democratic State, revise ratings on a man who on the face of his papers shows he was not entitled to the revised grade?

Mr. ROACH. If the gentleman will allow me to express my opinion of the Civil Service Commission, it can, in my opinion, be induced to do most anything over there. Perhaps after my trip to Panama I will have some further remarks to make in regard to that commission in connection with legislation to curtail their activities or abolish the commission altogether, which I have in mind to offer later on.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it true that both the gentleman and other Members of the House on that side, and the Republican heads, are asking the commission to revise figures where Republicans are put on the list?

Mr. ROACH. Oh, I do not know. It is my personal experience and observation, however, that these departments are so infested with employees from the minority party that we are not able to accomplish much in the way of securing appointments, and I think it is about time that, instead of creating any more new positions, we should dispose of the people of the minority holding some of these positions and from now on fill them with Republicans. I believe in the old adage, "To the victor belong the spoils." [Applause.] When you boys win I want you to have all that is coming to you, and when we win I think we ought to have the same. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the proforma amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH], who has just taken his seat.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous consent request?

Mr. WINGO. Just wait for a moment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Very well.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the last statement of my friend from Missouri [Mr. ROACH], because I was a little bit puzzled on hearing the early part of his remarks. I am very fond of him, and I find myself in accord with him on some things, and I do not want the House to misunderstand me. I am not protesting against partisan appointments. I did not agree with President Wilson when he appointed Republican postmasters in my State in strict adherence to his civil-service rule. I did not agree with President Wilson when he appointed in the Northern States a majority in number as Republican postmasters under that order of his and only a bare majority in number of Democrats in the Southern States under that last order of his. I believe in the civil service for purely clerical positions, but in a position of executive authority, where a bureau or office or department is called upon to carry out a party policy, I say it is good judgment for the party in power to have its own agents to carry it out. [Applause.]

I disagreed with President Wilson because he went further than that. I criticize Mr. Hays, not for appointing Republicans to postmasterships, but on account of his hypocrisy in pretending that he is not doing it. [Applause.] I say, Why do you not have the courage, as we Democrats did, in the beginning of the first Wilson administration? I said, "Yes; I am going to make a fight to name the men that I want for postmasters." [Applause.] And who, gentlemen, is better qualified to recommend postmasters than the Congressmen who keep in touch with their districts and know who are competent and acceptable? [Applause.]

The thing I complain of is that you pretend that you are running a Sunday School down here at the Post Office Department, headed by a Presbyterian deacon, when I know that his real claim for distinction is that he is a past master of partisan politics, and that he is put into that place to take care of faithful Republicans. I am not objecting to his appointment of Republicans but I am objecting to his hypocritical pretense. That is all.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WINGO. No; I can not yield now. I want to finish. Now, in reference to the Civil Service Commission, I regret that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH] has not as much influence with the Civil Service Commission as have the Republican bosses in some, at least, of the Democratic States, because I say that in one case they have at the request of the Republican leader revised the grade of a man who on the face of those papers was not competent. He is not competent, and in addition to that he is a carpetbagger. He did not give a single reference in his civil-service examination to a single resident of the State in which he was to be appointed, but he had to give as his references persons living in another State.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman designate the particular office where that is done?

Mr. WINGO. I find that the gentleman from Missouri is in a row with the Civil Service Commission. If he really wants information I can take him where he can get all the information he wants. If he will go down and ask the Post Office Department officials frankly, "Are you going to appoint a Democrat where the Republican Party organization of that State objects and has a man that it wants? Are you going to appoint a Democrat, who is the head man on the list, or who is an ex-service man, over a Republican candidate, indorsed by the Republican referee?" They will say frankly, "No." They will appoint a Republican.

I always watch one of these nonpartisan gentlemen. [Laughter.]

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does not the gentleman think from the applause that he is receiving from the Republican side, the President failed to consult Republican Congressmen before he issued his Executive order pertaining to presidential postmasters?

Mr. WINGO. I say it is an outrage, in my opinion, that some little Republican boss in a Democratic State should dictate postmasterships. I say that a Congressman who comes here ought to know something about his district, and know who should best serve the community as postmaster. I say it is an outrage for some little political boss to override the Congressman who is elected. I think Will Hays and President Harding ought to give you Republican Congressmen the postmasters you name. They are doing it in some instances, but in others they are permitting Republican bosses to override the indorsement of Republican Congressmen. I repeat, I do not object to partisan appointments, but I want them made openly and not under a false pretense of nonpartisanship and behind the manipulated screen of the civil service. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON rose.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from South Carolina desire to discuss the pending amendment?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; in a general way. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to precipitate myself into this very considerable melee about post offices; but the gentleman from Illinois a while ago expressed doubt as to the authenticity of some of these developments that have been referred to. Now, if the gentleman will go and look at the records in a county that is very near to mine but not in my district—and therefore I am not interfering, for it is none of my business—he will find that in the city of Conway in the county of Horry, in the State of South Carolina, the referee in that district announced before the examination was heard from that Mr. A would be appointed postmaster. When the examination was heard from and the list was certified to the Post Office Department, lo and behold Mr. A did not get on that list. He was not eligible. They could not get at him with a 40-foot pole with a hook on the end of it or a shepherd's crook. What did they do? They went up there and they had it revised by the Civil Service Commission, and by using the shepherd's crook of this divine institution known as the Civil Service Commission they hung him on the last round, No. 3, and they immediately appointed him postmaster. You may say that there is nothing in the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. I do not draw any inferences but you are drawing them yourselves. I know it from the expression on your faces. You are drawing the inference. It is partisan politics that has done it. Now, I do not blame them. I state frankly that Andrew Jackson was born and reared in my district, and I have always subscribed to his doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. [Applause.] I sympathize with the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for one observation?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman does not mean to say that he subscribes to the practice of the Civil Service Commission in undertaking to revise its report so as to get a man on the list?

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, I disagree with the Civil Service Commission in its revision which enables the administration to appoint a man who by the certificate of the Civil Service Commission was declared and found to be incompetent. I disagree with that, but I am just like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] who some time ago spoke his mind here. I do not believe in that method of the selection of postmasters and I never have agreed with it and I never will. So far as I am concerned I prefer to be shorn of the responsibility, and I am glad that the gentleman from Missouri and his party have the responsibility to-day of naming postmasters. But when they say that there is nothing in the charge that there is manipulation, when the favored man of the organization does not get on the list, and they go and revise the list and get him on it, I say there are inferences to be drawn from circumstances such as I have related to you that are beyond cavil or dispute. You can not evade them.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROACH. Does not the gentleman believe that when the Civil Service Commission pursues the methods and practices to which he has just made reference its jurisdiction over postoffice examinations should be taken away from it?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had said that before. I did not agree with the order of April, 1917, which was ironclad and which was enforced, and I do not believe in the more hypocritical order of May, 1921, which broadened it out and endeavored to give the boys a chance to get the faithful on, and then they go and rape that whenever the occasion arises, to override it by a revision and a reconstitution of the list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 6, line 17, strike out the words "Civil Service Commission" and insert in lieu thereof "Bureau of Efficiency."

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as folows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Strike out section 7.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to point out some inconsistencies in this paragraph and in the preceding paragraph which to my mind are conclusive that this bill should never become a law.

In section 6 it is provided that—

2. If the employee is receiving compensation less than the minimum salary of the grade or division thereof in which his duties fall, the compensation shall be increased to that minimum rate.

3. If the employee is receiving compensation within the range of salary prescribed for the appropriate grade at one of the rates fixed therein, no change shall be made in the existing compensation.

4. If the employee is receiving compensation within the range of salary prescribed for the appropriate grade, but not at one of the rates fixed therein, the compensation shall be increased to the next higher rate.

In the last paragraph of the section now under consideration it is provided that reductions in compensation and dismissals shall be made by heads of departments, and so forth. There is a nigger in that woodpile, for there can be no reductions to a lower grade, or to a lower compensation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman read—

As provided in section 9 herein—which changes the entire meaning of the paragraph?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; you can read section 9 in connection with this. The criticism has been offered before, and I desire to reiterate it again, that this bill was never created for the purpose of lowering a salary, no matter how much too high that salary might be. It has every provision for increasing salaries but no adequate provision for lowering them. I wish to call your attention to a thing that is most significant. Every Member of this House whom I have talked to, when this bill was first brought in for consideration, received a telegram asking him to support this measure. Every one of those telegrams comes from the head of the Federal Employees Union in this town, or at his suggestion. If this bill could be denominated by its proper title it would be entitled the "Luther Stewart bill." The representatives of the Federal Employees Union are in the galleries now. They are all around here urging upon this body their desire for the passing of this bill. It never was offered in the interest of the Government. It never was drafted to save a dollar to the Treasury of the United States. It was drawn, if you please, in accord with their desires, and that is the reason why they are so earnestly insisting upon its passage.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Has there been any statement here in any such form that we could see what the results of this would be in saving?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, the question has been repeatedly asked and answered. It is absolutely a physical impossibility for anybody to form an intelligent conclusion in figures from this bill.

Those who attempted this classification provided for here have estimated that it would increase the pay roll of the District of Columbia from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000. They have estimated that the service outside and inside would be increased $20,000,000.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. They have taken those estimates and applied them to the different departments theoretically to see what the effect would be.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is my information.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. And everywhere it is an increase.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Everybody knows that it is going to increase the expenditures, and the conservative estimate is that it will increase them in the District of Columbia by $8,000,000, and outside of the District of Columbia $12,000,000. I am calling attention to this at this time to show the absolute inconsistency. It provides for an increase, but no adequate provision is made for a decrease. You may be assured that there will be no decrease, but there will be an increase up to the maximum.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman means to say that the forward gear is all right but there is no reverse gear. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is it, full steam ahead for the maximum salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. There is a provision beginning on line 13, page 7, for a decrease in the rate of compensation for employees who at the time are above the minimum rate for the class to which their positions are allocated and permitting the Civil Service Commission and the heads of departments after consultation to reduce the salary.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but here is the defect: Here is a definite fixed manner prescribed in the bill for an increase but no definite fixed manner for a decrease. For a decrease you have got to go through the civil-service allocation, the budget, the Bureau of Efficiency, and get up to where they may possibly decrease after a full hearing. But that will never occur, and it was never meant that it should occur.

Mr. FESS. I think there is a good deal of force in what the gentleman says. I do not recall ever seeing a salary reduced.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made several times by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and also by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and some others, that no estimates are available as to the increased cost of this bill. The case which these gentlemen have attempted to make out has been argued as if the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service had not made any study of this subject, did not have any information as to what the bill would cost, and has considered it wholly in the dark. Now is as good time as any to put that statement to rest. Let us briefly review the history of the whole legislation. In March, 1919, when the Democrats were in control of both Houses of Congress, provision was made for the appointment of a reclassification commission, and it was the duty of that commission to make an investigation of the whole Government service in the District of Columbia and make its report to Congress. There were appointed upon that commission three Senators and three ex-Members of the House. The commission made a thorough and exhaustive investigation of the whole subject. They put in the hands of every employee in the Government service here in the District a questionnaire, and the answers to those questionnaires showed the compensation that the employee was receiving, the class of duties that he was performing, and all of the surrounding circumstances with reference to his employment.

When these questionnaires were returned the commission had every one of the many thousand of them carefully analyzed and each employee classified. In this work the commission had as their assistants some of the leading authorities in the United States on reclassification work. The commission then submitted to Congress an estimate of what would be the cost if their recommendations were put into effect, and if the House will bear with me at this point, in order to refute the statement that has been repeatedly made that the committee knew nothing about the increased cost I am going to take the liberty of reading to you what this reclassification commission said about it. If there is any better authority in the House as to the increased cost let him give his reasons for his superior knowledge.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Does the report from which the gentleman reads refer to this bill?

Mr. BLACK. The salary schedules are the same as in this bill, and I may say it is the intention of the committee to propose certain amendments which have been agreed upon which will reduce the salary scales to where I think it may be safely stated that there will not be a larger aggregate increase than 2 per cent, and my judgment is that if the reclassification is efficiently and carefully done the appropriations for salaries after this bill goes into effect should be considerably less than at present. I make this statement, based upon the belief that there should be a considerable reduction in the number of employees in the District after the reclassification is done.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give the date when that questionnaire was sent out?

Mr. BLACK. Some time in 1919, and the reclassification report was made in March, 1920.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Has the gentleman taken this law and applied it in its application, and can he give us the figures as to by how many it will reduce the number on our payrolls, and by how much it will reduce the amount of salary that we are paying now?

Mr. BLACK. There has already been a considerable reduction. There has been a reduction of some four or five thousand employees in the District since the 1st of July, 1921.

Mr. SNYDER. But the gentleman will admit, of course, that that has nothing to do with this at all?

Mr. BLACK. Oh, none at all. Let me read from this report, as I stated I would a while ago, for the purpose of giving light on the question of costs:

> In considering the cost of the proposed changes in salaries your commission was of necessity compelled to depend on carefully prepared estimates. Our statistical staff made a detailed study of 68,806 positions, or approximately 70 per cent of the total number in the Washington service, to estimate the cost of the recommendations made in respect to them. These positions represented practically all of the numerically important classes of employees working full time and receiving no special allowance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. To continue the reading from the report:

> We regard these estimates as giving results of substantial accuracy, not only because the classes were representative, but also because the average basic salary of the positions included in the estimates was $1,242, and the average basic salary of all the 100,000 positions on our position list, as based on the pay rolls and reports submitted by the departments was $1,240.
> The other test to which the estimates were submitted seems to us to demonstrate that the percentages of increases they showed were substantially accurate.
> Judging from these figures we would place the percentage of increase in pay, over and above the present pay, including the bonus, at between 8 and 10 per cent. We believe the percentage will be nearer 8 than 10. A closer statement is difficult, because for most classes provision is made for efficiency advances within the class. Actual experience alone will demonstrate how many of the employees in a given class will get the maximum and how many the minimum. With due allowance for this factor of uncertainty, we believe it safe to say that the increased appropriations involved will not exceed 10 per cent over the present pay, including bonus, and in all probability will be approximately 8.5 per cent.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I see the statement there is that it would not exceed 10 per cent of the present statutory salary with the bonus included. Has the gentleman computed what 10 per cent of the present salary list with the bonus included amounts to?

Mr. BLACK. Yes. It would amount to about eight or ten million dollars, but the committee has agreed upon amendments to all of these schedules which will be offered in time, and I am sure will be adopted. Since these amendments have been agreed upon we have had their practical effect analyzed, and the opinion is that when the House adopts these amendments, if it does adopt them, and I think it will, the increase will certainly not exceed 2 per cent over the present expenditures.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Reverting to my query to the gentleman from Indiana a moment ago, does the report from which the gentleman is reading show any decrease anywhere in any salary?

Mr. BLACK. The salary schedules as such do not show any decreases, but it is expected that in the allocation to grades that some decreases will result. The gentleman asked yesterday if an employee could be reduced and I am glad he did. The statement has often been made, and I have no doubt there is some foundation for it, that in certain cases employees are receiving considerably more than the nature of the work they are doing would entitle them to receive. In other words, that there are favorites of the department heads who have been placed in positions where they do not belong. Placed there because of political and other reasons. When the committee originally considered the bill there was a provision in it, and it was also in the Senate bill, which prevented the reduction of any salary by means of his reclassification. Consequently the gentleman from Ohio can see that if an employee is in the clerical service and is drawing $1,800 a year, but really belongs in grade 2 and will be classified there when this reclassification work is done, and that provision to which I have referred had remained in the bill, such employee would have been put into class 2 all right, but as long as he remained in the Government service he would have continued to draw $1,800 per year, notwithstanding that amount is $300 more than the maximum salary of grade 2. We struck that provis'on out. The committee takes the position that the classification should be carefully made and that every employee should be put into the grade where his work belongs, and should draw the salary of that grade, and if it means that he will be reduced in his present salary, then he will have to take it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman has expressed the proper theory. The only doubt I had yesterday and also to-day is with respect to the rating of the salaries. All of us agree that there are salaries that ought to be increased, and I think a few of us believe that some salaries should be decreased for the amount of work that is done. The bill seems to be written upon that theory. Will that be put into practice under our method of procedure?

Mr. BLACK. I think so. I think we will come a great deal nearer getting it by a systematic classification than under the present system. Certainly everyone will admit there is a great lack of uniformity now. Let me give the gentleman an illustration as to the practical workings of this bill. Take grade 2 in the clerical service. Gentlemen will find that grade on page 14 of the bill. It is there provided:

> Grade 2, which may be referred to as the assistant clerical grade, shall include all classes of positions in this service, the duties of which are to perform, under supervision, assigned clerical work requiring training or experience, but not the exercise of independent judgment. This grade shall include ordinary typists and stenographers.

If a clerk belongs in that grade the entrance salary under this bill is $1,200, or will be if our committee amendment is adopted. It is true that at the present time these employees come to Washington for about $1,100, typists and stenographers, but they get the bonus after six months' satisfactory work. The announcement digest of the Civil Service Commission notifies them that they will get the bonus. Their pay then amounts to $1,340 a year. Some gentlemen have stated on the floor, "I can get a typist or stenographer in my home town for $75 a month or $900 per year."

Perhaps they can, Mr. Chairman; and we might follow that same rule if all the employees were to be taken from the District of Columbia. But we all know that we have a provision in the civil service law that requires an apportionment among the States of these employees; and is there a Member of the House who wants a young lady typist or a stenographer in his district to come to Washington and undertake to enter the Government service at less than $100 a month? I do not think anyone will contend that amount of pay is excessive when we consider the high cost of living here in Washington.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield there——

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. FESS. For a question on the gentleman's statement a moment ago? This bill, the gentleman says, carries an initial salary of about $1,200.

Mr. BLACK. For that class of clerks.

Mr. FESS. That would be a saving of $140 over——

Mr. BLACK. Over the present pay.

Mr. FESS. What becomes of that other provision we spoke of yesterday in which the bonus is to be included in making up the basic salary?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, it does not say that; it says in computing the present compensation.

Mr. FESS. Equivalent to adding the bonus?

Mr. BLACK. Let me be frank with the gentleman from Ohio. I said that employees who come into the Government service in the future will come in at $1,200. Those who are now in the service are receiving a compensation of $1,100 plus the $240 increase. If that should still be their compensation a year hence, when this reclassification is to be made, these employees would be put in that grade or that subdivision of the grade which corresponds with the salary they are now receiving; but all employees who come into the service in the future come in at the minimum rate.

Mr. FESS. So the reduction would be made in the case of new employees?

Mr. BLACK. It would. I want to make clear to the gentleman's mind, however, that there is a provision in this bill that requires a reduction of compensation where the employee is now receiving a salary in excess of the maximum salary of the grade in which he is placed. As a matter of fact, some reductions will undoubtedly be made.

Mr. FESS. I want to state to my friend I am in sympathy with the theory of this legislation, and I have been in a quandary to know whether in the rating there would be anything like a reduction; we know there will be increases, but will there be any real reduction?

Mr. BLACK. What I took the floor for, if I had time, was to take up the bill of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] commonly known as the Wood-Smoot bill, and compare some of its salary schedules with the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be continued for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What is the minimum salary under this bill?

Mr. BLACK. Well, that would depend upon the service and the grade.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I mean the minimum.

Mr. BLACK. Two hundred and forty dollars. That includes grade 1 in the subprofessional class. There will, of course, be very few in that class. They will be apprentices who will be preparing for license or training for some grade or profession.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is, the clerical grade?

Mr. BLACK. No; the lowest clerical grade would be $1,080.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Now, we have to-day and have had for a long period of time several thousand people in the Government service who receive much less than $1,080. Will they be advanced to $1,080 from $660, $720, $840, and $900? Will they all go up to $1,080?

Mr. BLACK. There are no clerks——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. There are thousands of them.

Mr. BLACK. None that I know of.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. There are.

Mr. BLACK. Not classed as clerks.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I have entered many of them on the rolls myself, drawn through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BLACK. I will answer the gentleman frankly and say that anyone whose work is classed as clerical work will receive an entrance salary of $1,080 under this bill, even if he is only in clerical grade 1. That is only $90 per month, and I hardly think anyone can say that is too much compensation, even for very simple clerical work.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. There were a large number in years past at much lower grades, listed as clerks, certified as such, and appointed as such.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I was a member of the Reclassification Commission, and what the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS] says reminds me of an important finding of fact reported by that commission. The gentleman says that he finds people rated as clerks at $600, $700, or $800.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Seven hundred and twenty dollars, perhaps; $840 or $900.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We found persons doing essentially the same work getting all sorts of salaries.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. And that you will never cure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, we want to try.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. You will try and you will not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We are going to try by this bill; but we found 106 titles, different titles, of people doing practically the same work but receiving widely different salaries.

Mr. BLACK. Now, I am compelled not to yield further, for this reason——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I wanted to get by my question to the matter of the increase by this bill of those people who are now listed as clerks who will get the $1,080.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They were not clerks in many cases——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. They were certified as such by the Civil Service Commission and appointed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I want to say——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. They were certified as such.

Mr. BLACK. I can not yield further. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has been a persistent critic of this bill. I have a very high regard for him personally, but I think much of his criticism is unfounded. Now, let us compare a schedule of this bill with his own bill. I have in my hand the bill known as the Wood-Smoot bill, and I read from page 41 of the bill with reference to the chief clerk in one of the large departments. It says:

> Under general direction, having administrative control over the clerical force, and responsibility for the general business operations of one of the largest departments.

That class would include the chief clerks of such departments as the Treasury Department, a very responsible position.

Now, what is his salary according to this Wood-Smoot bill? It is $4,500 to $5,700. Now, let us read from our bill which we are now considering. This same employee would fall in clerical grade 7. With the amendment which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] proposes, or will propose, our range for this grade of employee is from $3,780 to $4,740, as against $4,500 to $5,700 in the Wood-Smoot bill. And I could offer many similar illustrations of that kind showing that our bill does not in any sense present an extravagant range of salaries. If you will examine this pending bill carefully you will find that it can meet the test not only from the standpoint of economy but from the standpoint of a uniform, equal, systematic classification of the Government employees. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that substantially the figures and comments, I think, that the gentleman from Texas has employed in the course of his remarks can be found in the RECORD of December 9, on pages 171, 172, 173, and 174.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

There has been a good deal of criticism of the committee to the effect that it has, without any thought or any particular attention to the salaries or expense, brought in a bill here in which there were to be very large increases, and that the committee had no knowledge of the probable cost. And yet these statements were purposely put in the RECORD that the Members of the House might familiarize themselves with the matter. In addition to that, the committee had met and specifically adopted certain amendments which they proposed to offer to the rates in the various grades where they are under consideration. The committee is convinced that the cost will not be any more than at present, and most of us believe that the cost will be absolutely less.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Do you not think that a copy of your bill could have been furnished to the heads of the different departments and that they could have given you in return facts and figures that would have justified an exact statement instead of surmises and guesses?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The exact cost of the bill would depend upon the allocation.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Why not allocate?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because the allocations made by the chief of the bureau of "this" is on a different idea than that of the chief of the bureau of "that," but when these tentative allocations are made, and when the advice of the Bureau of Efficiency and the Civil Service Commission is brought to bear and revision is made by the Bureau of the Budget, then you will have a uniform and reasonable allocation. That is what the bill provides for.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The truth is that always with regard to legislation there is some question as to its specific effect.

Mr. LEHLBACH. May I interrupt the gentleman once more?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I desire to say that as of April 30, 1919, when the last exact figures were had, the force of employees in the city of Washington, which was numbered at 90,815, have been entirely allocated to their respective services and grades and the salaries applied, all of which is shown in those tables in the RECORD. We can not allocate at the present time, because we have not the precise information of what each man in every department is doing.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. What I meant to say was this, that the committee took every precaution to convince itself as to the probable cost, and then prepared express amendments which will be proposed when the various rates are under consideration, and then there will be opportunity to thrash out definitely as to the amount of increase or reduction, or whether they practically remain the same. The thing that I resent is that men will say again and again on the floor of the House that the bill has been brought in without any thought or any consideration. It has been under consideration by the committee from the time that the report was made by the Reclassification Committee, and I may say that, in my judgment, the other bills that were prepared were compilations that were thrown together hastily in order that the bill which the regular committee was to introduce might be supplanted. I may be wrong with regard to that, but that conviction is pretty deep in my own mind. We went over the Wood bill in committee and we were convinced that that bill would increase the expenses more than our own bill with the modifications that we put in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill to one point. The proposition in the last clause of this section 7 relates to dismissal. The clause provides dismissal shall be made by the heads of the departments, subject to the approval of the Civil Service Commission. Now, will not that clause, standing as it does, be construed to repeal the existing law which provides how the Civil Service Commission shall act upon a suggested dismissal? That law provides, among other things, for a hearing if desired by the employee involved.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is not in the existing law, I think, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. A continuing provision was incorporated in the Post Office appropriation bill approved August, 1912, and your committee in the last few months, during the extra session, reported favorably a bill that was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] amending that provision.

The law of 1912 is recognized as in effect by the bill last referred to, which proposes an amendment thereto. My point is this: That an official of the Government could, if you leave this final clause of section 7 just as it is written, rule that it operates to repeal existing law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It does not; and if the gentleman from Virginia will bear with me, I will show him why, in my judgment, it does not. The power of removal and dismissal that now exists in the department head, and any functions that the Civil Service Commission under existing law now has to perform with regard thereto, are unimpaired. But we provide in this bill for a new ground of dismissal, namely, lack of maintaining a standard rate of efficiency, which is provided for in section 9 herein, and this paragraph, requiring that reductions and dismissals shall be made by the heads of departments subject to the approval of the Civil Service Commission, relates only by its terms to such reductions and dismissals as are provided for in section 9 herein, and limits the operation of the paragraph to such reductions and dismissals as are provided in section 9 herein. It leaves untouched the law in other circumstances.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Virginia referred to a bill which was enacted into law, amending the Post Office bill. Now, on lines 11 and 12, on page 2 of the pending measure, we find that the word "position" relates to a civilian office in departments other than offices or employments in the Postal Service.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; and the provision to which I allude, contained in the Post Office appropriation bill, is a general provision. It is not limited to employment in the Post Office Department. I merely wish to draw attention to this point.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says it is general legislation enacted on the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes, sir. If the chairman of the committee is content with the clause in question as it is written, I will not press an opposite view.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That very point was given very careful scrutiny by the committee. Some amendments and suggestions were considered, and the committee finally arrived at the determination that the effect of the paragraph was as I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], striking out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That, subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget, the rates of compensation of all employees to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable by section 3 hereof shall be fixed and readjusted from time to time by a board of three members, to be known as the Federal Wage Commission, who shall be appointed by the President and shall hold office during his pleasure. One member of such commission shall be chosen from the employees affected. The commission is authorized to employ such assistance, at reasonable compensation, and make such necessary expenditures as may be appropriated for by Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the section.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this section establishes some new machinery and incidentally creates some new offices. It provides:

That, subject to the revision and approval of the Bureau of the Budget, the rates of compensation of all employees to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable by section 3 hereof shall be fixed and readjusted from time to time by a board of three members, to be known as the Federal Wage Commission.

By reference to section 3 you will find that the particular ones to whom this applies are those which are named in section 3 as apprentices, helpers, or people who do journeymen's work in a recognized trade or craft and skilled and semiskilled labor. Therefore it would appear that this section provides machinery by which the wages of men who work in arsenals and navy yards shall be fixed.

Under the existing law, gentlemen, as is well known, the wages of men who work in navy yards and arsenals of the United States are to-day fixed by wage commissions. The law is—and we have established it in the several acts until it has become the fixed law of the land—that in each arsenal, we will say, a commission is appointed to fix the wages of the men who work in that particular arsenal. On this commission, which is under the control of the Secretary of War, but directly appointed, I think, by the commandant of the particular institution, the laboring men are represented and the Government is represented. They get together and they fix the wages according, as the law says, to the rates that are paid in private industry in that particular locality.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman, of course, realizes that this provision refers only to the employees in the District of Columbia, because the bill has no reference to those who work outside of the District.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not so understand it.

Mr. BLACK. That provision has no application to Government employees outside of the District.

Mr. HULL. The navy yard would be included.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; the employees of the navy yard would be included.

Mr. BARKLEY. What section of the bill is it that limits this bill to fixing of wages in the District?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I should like the gentleman from Texas to explain that.

Mr. DALLINGER. Section 3.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. On what theory does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] claim that this bill refers only to employees within the District of Columbia?

Mr. BLACK. Section 3 provides—

That the compensation schedules shall apply only to civilian employees in the departments within the District of Columbia, and shall not apply to employees in positions the duties of which are to perform or to assist in apprentice, helper, or journeyman work in a recognized trade or craft, and skilled and semiskilled laborers.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is, classified service.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not understand it the way the gentleman does. He may be right about this, but there is considerable doubt in my mind about that proposition. It looks to me as though this section as it is drawn includes any person who works in a place as a civil-service employee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think section 3 merely means that these compensation schedules shall apply only to classified employees in the District of Columbia, and not to those classified outside the District, and that the wage commission shall have jurisdiction over all skilled and unskilled labor, such as the gentleman is talking about, wherever they may be located.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The title of the bill is this:

To provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let me draw this to the gentleman's attention: It would be almost absurd to provide by this section that we are on now for a wage board to deal only with the navy yard in the District.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is what I said.

Mr. BLACK. It would deal also with the employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and those of the Government Printing Office, and other skilled trades are included.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will look at line 18, on page 6, he will see that his contention is correct:

That, subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget, the rates of compensation of all employees to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable by section 3 hereof shall be fixed and readjusted from time to time by a board of three members, to be known as the Federal wage commission, who shall be appointed by the President and shall hold office during his pleasure.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is right, and I believe a reasonable interpretation of this bill would be that all employees who work in navy yards or arsenals throughout the United States probably would come under the intent and purview of this act. If they do, their wages to-day are fixed by a machinery which has been constituted by law and which, so far as I know, is working satisfactorily. The biggest ordnance arsenal in the United States, I presume, is in the district which I have the honor to represent, and I know how that machinery is working there. I have been told by other gentlemen on the floor of the House here how it is working in their districts where there are similar institutions. It is working all right and it is working with economy and dispatch, and it is not costing the United States Government a single penny, as far as I know, at this time. These boards operating in these different places are doing this work gratuitously, without compensation, and are costing the Government nothing, and the machinery is working smoothly, the men are satisfied, and the Government is getting fair treatment. Every particular institution has its own peculiar local condition, which ought to be taken into account. Now, what is the idea here in this thing? It is to set up a Federal wage commission. I believe, gentlemen, that we have enough wage commissions in this country of ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We have enough trouble with the wage commissions that we have now, and it is a very serious question in my mind whether we have not entirely too many of them and whether we ought not to abolish some of those that we already have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield? I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. May not this section be interpreted to apply not only to all skilled and unskilled labor within these Government arsenals and navy yards, and so on, but may it not also be interpreted to apply to all Government employees outside of the District of Columbia, because they are all excluded by section 3, so that this wage commission would apply to everybody who is excluded by section 3?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is at least an arguing ground for that. It is somewhat ambiguous. I do not know just what it does mean, but I do know this, that the very moment you pass this bill and make it the law you build up a great institution here and a large expense account and a new board, which will immediately do as all other boards and all other commissions have done from time immemorial. It will build up a large clerical force, and it will go to work fixing wages in the country from Washington, and every institution at any place in the country will have to come to Washington to have wages fixed here instead of having that done by wage boards in the particular locality, who are familiar with conditions there.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Where does final authority rest to-day to fix the wages of these people?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It rests in the head of the department, where it ought to rest. Let me call your attention to the folly of some of this machinery. The section says:

Subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget.

If it is subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget, that intends, does it not, that the Bureau of the Budget can change it if it is necessary? Therefore the men who are working in the Government navy yards under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, for whose labor the Secretary of the Navy is responsible and for the administration of which he is responsible, are to have their wages supervised and fixed by the Bureau of the Budget, an entirely different concern. The responsibility for the work that is done in the navy yards rests with the Secretary of the Navy. He is the administrative head. He ought to have something to say about the organization and the working rules and the wages of the men who are under him, and he ought to be held responsible, as the Secretary of War ought to be held responsible for the work that is done and the wages paid in his department. Here you are saying that all this shall be subject to supervision by the Bureau of the Budget, and thereby setting up another piece of useless machinery, which will cause conflict between these departments and is not workable.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And are we not adding to the Bureau of the Budget an entirely different responsibility than was contemplated when the Bureau of the Budget was established? [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely. Let me call your attention to that. When this Bureau of the Budget was established it was not established for the purpose of fixing wages. It was appointed as a bureau to figure up the expenses of the Government and figure up how much we were going to get from revenues and taxes and advise the President, so that we could make our suit fit our cloth. But now we are adding to the powers of that bureau in this bill and many other like bills, trying to make it a wage-fixing body, trying to make it fix everything else, to go into all the departments and do things that it was never intended on God's earth that it should do. Gentlemen, the theory is wrong. You had better leave the Bureau of the Budget out of this thing. In the first place the Bureau of the Budget does not want this responsibility. I do not believe there is a man on this committee, the chairman of the committee or anybody else, who will say that the Bureau of the Budget ever sought any such power, and I believe in my heart they do not want it. The thing to do is to hold the heads of these departments responsible for this thing, put the responsibility on them, and let them do it. This section, to my mind, ought to go out of this bill.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LONDON: Page 6, line 20, insert after the word "employees" the following: "except such employees whose compensation is now being determined by the now existing wage board."

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment is to except from the operation of section 8 the branch of the Government service where the compensation of the Government employees is determined by wage boards. On the wage board the employees have a representative and the Government has a representative. They consult in order to reach a conclusion as to the compensation to be paid, and they take into consideration the wages prevailing in the neighborhood in similar industries. These employees would like to be excepted from the operation of section 8 as it is now worded.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that I have a perfecting amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, but as I favor the proposal made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out section 8 in its entirety, I would prefer to have my amendment read for information, and if the section is not stricken out I will offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read for information of the committee.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KINDRED: Page 6, line 22, after the word "as," strike out the remainder of section 8 and insert the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That a Board of Adjustment, hereinafter referred to as the 'board,' which shall be composed of three members, to be appointed by the President, one member to serve during his first term for a period of two years; one to serve for a period of three years, and one to serve for a period of four years, and upon the expiration of the above-named terms the said members thereafter shall be appointed for and serve for a period of three years. Of said members, one shall be a representative of the employees of navy yards and arsenals of the United States and of all employees to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable in section 3 and nominated by them to the President in such manner as a majority of all such employees may determine; one member shall be a representative of the United States, as the employer; and the third member shall represent the general public. The board shall choose one of its members to act as its chairman. In the event of a vacancy in the membership, from any cause, the same shall be immediately filled by the same nominative and appointive authority as in the original appointment.

"That no member of the board shall receive compensation, but shall be allowed actual expenses, and the board shall elect a secretary, who shall receive a compensation of $3,500 per annum, and shall appoint such other assistants or employees as may from time to time be found necessary.

"That the board shall annually, on the 1st day of January, establish a fair and reasonable wage and salary schedule to include all classes of employees of the navy yards and arsenals, and said schedule shall be effective for one year.

"In determining the justness and reasonableness of such wage schedules the board shall take into consideration all relevant factors."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Is that a substitute for the bill?

Mr. KINDRED. It is not a substitute for the bill, but a very pertinent amendment to some of the workings of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was read for information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one amendment to perfect the text of the bill and an amendment to strike out the section.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am laboring under some confusion about the scope of section 8, but as I understand it I am against it and hope it will be stricken out. Section 8 and section 3 must be read together in order to understand them. Section 8 says that "the rates of compensation of all employees to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable by section 3 hereof shall be fixed and readjusted from time to time by a board of three members," and so forth, and that is subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget. In other words, the Government service, according to my interpretation of the bill, whether in the District of Columbia or anywhere else, whose salary is not fixed according to these schedules outlined in the various sections of this bill, are to be fixed by this wage board. The reading of the section by reference back to section 3 says that "the compensation schedule shall apply only to civilian employees in the departments within the District of Columbia," and that means that everybody excluded in section 3 is included in section 8.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Fortifying the gentleman's position, the title of the bill is "to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services."

Mr. BARKLEY. That is undoubtedly true, and we have to find out what they mean by "employees" by looking at the definition in section 2, which says that the term "employee" means any person temporarily or permanently in a "position," and the term "position" means "a specific civilian office or employment, whether occupied or vacant, in a department other than offices or employment in the Postal Service and teachers under the board of education of the District of Columbia." In other words, every employee in the United States outside of the District of Columbia will be included in the provisions of section

8 that gives the wage board the right to fix salary and compensation. I certainly agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that so far as fixing the wages is concerned in the arsenals and the navy yards and other Government institutions by this proposed wage board, where the present law is operating to the satisfaction of the Government and employees, it is an unwise thing. It is unwise to set up in Washington a central wage board to which the representatives of all employees in the various Government establishments, wherever located, must go to have their wages adjusted. It is unwise centralization, one that we have been trying to get away from in this country for years.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Would it not be just as consistent to do away with all of these provisions we have here with reference to the civilian employees and to constitute a board to classify those civilian employees? We are undertaking to deal with them in considerable detail. When you come to these employees that are not in the civilian group in the departments, then it is proposed, as the gentleman states, that a special wage board shall deal with them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; and the effect of that is that when the Congress of the United States, by the passage of this classification bill, fixes the salaries of the civilian employees in the District of Columbia, who compose about eighty or ninety thousand out of 450,000 Government employees throughout the United States, that all the rest of them are to have their salaries fixed by this centralized wage board, which is to be located here in the city of Washington.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. For the gentleman's information, I would state that the skilled trades in the city of Washington asked to not be reclassified. We will propose an amendment confining this to the District.

Mr. BARKLEY. As the bill now reads it is not confined to the District. I do not know whether it would be a wise thing to confine it to the District of Columbia in so far as the classified employees of the United States are concerned. Are they entitled to any more special consideration in the District of Columbia than the thousands of classified Government employees all over the United States? I am not sure, even if the members of the committee offer that amendment, that it ought to be adopted; but certainly as the bill is written now, or as it may be amended, this wage board ought not to be set up here for the purpose of fixing the wages of these employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the amendment which I have offered meet the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not entirely.

Mr. LONDON. My amendment provides that the employees whose compensation is now being determined by wage boards shall be excepted from the operation of section 8.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think that would correct the situation so far as the employees of arsenals and navy yards are concerned, but it still would not except the thousands of employees scattered all over the United States and it would not prevent this Budget Bureau from exercising not only supervisory power but in the exercise of that power it would not prevent them from the actual fixing of the compensation of all these other employees not included in these schedules outlined in the bill, and even though the gentleman's amendment were to be adopted, I think the whole section ought to be stricken out, because in the first place the Budget Bureau ought not to have that power, and in the next place this wage commission ought not to be set up. I hope the motion to strike out the section will be adopted. The wages of these skilled and unskilled employees in the arsenals, navy yards, and other Government plants are now being adjusted by boards that are on the ground and acquainted with local conditions. That system ought not to be abolished by the creation of a central wage board here in Washington.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted. I do not intend to try to prevent any Member from voting on the Graham amendment. I would like to take votes on these separate amendments as we go along, and I make the point of order that debate upon the London amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that debate upon the London amendment is exhausted. The Chair understands that there has been five minutes of debate on the amendment and five minutes in opposition thereto. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am heartily in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out this entire section. To my mind the section is absolutely unjustifiable and indefensible. This is no time to create a new commission with the large expense which inevitably will be involved in the creation of such a commission. This section—section 8—applies only to those employees who are engaged in the mechanical trades, which practically means the men who are employed in the arsenals and navy yards of the country. Their wages are now fixed in accordance with law by wage boards appointed from time to time by the commandants of the different arsenals and navy yards, involving no expense to the Government. Under the law these boards must fix the scale of wages according to the average wage paid for like work by private establishments in the vicinity. Those commissions are costing the Government nothing. They are working on the whole satisfactorily, the only cause of dissatisfaction being certain arbitrary regulations of the Ordnance Bureau. It is now proposed in place of them to have a new commission created to sit here in the city of Washington, a commission that is bound to be entirely unfamiliar with the local conditions in the different parts of the country, that is bound to cause dissatisfaction all along the line, and that will involve a wholly unnecessary expense to the already overburdened Treasury of the United States. I trust that the section will be stricken out.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be considerable misapprehension in respect to what section 8 means, to what section 3 purports to do, and what section 5 purports to do, and tortured, unreasonable, and fantastic constructions of the provisions of the bill have been put forward, which are entirely untenable and which do not rest upon the plain language and the plan and the scheme as incorporated in this measure. The purpose of this bill is to classify and to apply compensation schedules to civilian employees of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARKLEY rose.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I can not yield at this time until I have made my statement. Section 3 provides that these compensation schedules which are the classification and the rates of pay, shall apply only to civilian employees in departments of the District of Columbia. Section 5 provides that an analogous classification be made of employees outside of the District of Columbia. Section 3 further provides that the compensation schedules applicable to the civilian employees of the District shall not apply to the skilled trades and the skilled labor within the District, and it is provided in section 8 for a method of applying wages to the skilled trade employees of the Government within the District of Columbia. It does not apply any method of fixing the compensation of any skilled trade in the field service, but when the report of the classification is made, and nothing with reference to the field service is enacted into law until further action of the Congress, it is the intention that similar machinery for fixing the wages of skilled employees in the field as is here provided for fixing such wages in the District of Columbia shall be adopted, which will be exactly the system that now applies throughout the country in the various navy yards and arsenals. All section 8 does is to apply to the rest of the skilled grades in the District the system, the very system that is now in force in the navy yards here.

The Federal Wage Commission is constituted exactly as under the Navy Department and the War Department and existing wage commissions are created. It has exactly the same powers. It has exactly the same limitations, the limitation of the Bureau of the Budget that has in existing law supervision over every estimate and every pay roll submitted by every department to the Bureau of the Budget before it is submitted to the President and by him transmitted to the Congress on the first Monday in December. It does not in any way change existing law. It simply applies the existing law to the rest of the skilled trades where such system does not now obtain in the District of Columbia, and it does not in any way apply to the field service, and when they are classified, then similar systems which are now in vogue will be adopted for that purpose.

Mr. DALLINGER. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he is willing to accept an amendment in line 20, page 6, "In the District of Columbia"?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It would be superrogation——

Mr. DALLINGER. There is nothing in that section referring to the District of Columbia.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think it would be much better and broader and go more to the root——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It would go more to the root of the objections which have been voiced here. I do not agree with the premises upon which those objections are based; but now if the amendment by the gentleman from New York, that is pending, is adopted, that will cure all possible doubt as to the limitation, and then you preserve all existing wage boards throughout the country.

Mr. KINDRED. The amendment of which gentleman from New York?

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment of our distinguished Socialist friend from New York.

Mr. KINDRED. My amendment should have precedence.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey why, instead of providing for the creating of an entirely new Federal Wage Commission, you do not provide for a Federal Wage Commission in the District of Columbia to take care of these disputes in the District of Columbia?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because the wage commissions which are now created and are functioning in the District of Columbia are limited in their jurisdiction, and this will be general in jurisdiction.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Could you have imposed this duty upon it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is no machinery to be built up, no clerical expense. It is exactly—if there is clerical expense, if there is machinery in existence now in the existing wage board, it should be here, if not, it will not be here. It is exactly the same system, selected the same way. There is no salary, no authority to spend money, nothing of the sort at all.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to what the chairman of the committee has said about this. I do not think anybody on earth can read section 3 and agree with him in his contention. He says it only applies to the District of Columbia. That certainly can not be true. That section expressly states it shall not apply "to employees in positions the duties of which are to perform or assist in apprentice, and so forth." The title of the bill refers not only to a classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia but also to the field service. This particular class of workmen are exempt from the operation of this law and are brought under the Government Federal Wage Commission. I have listened to hear him show a good reason why it would only apply. Why under the shining sun should we set up this expensive machinery? He says it will not cost anything.

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can not yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman should not misquote anyone and refuse recognition for him to make a correction.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If I misquote, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I said it would apply to all skilled trades within the District of Columbia—the Printing Office, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and so forth, but only in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not agree and there is nothing in the bill that indicates this.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will yield, why not have a special commission for all stenographers in the District of Columbia and another special commission for every other form of employment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It would be just as sensible. Now, listen to this:

The commission is authorized to employ such assistants, at reasonable compensation, and make such necessary expenditures as may be appropriated for by Congress.

I want to know what that means? To build up an expensive commission to do work that is now being done satisfactorily? I can not agree with the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 6, line 20, insert, after the word "employees," the following: "except such employees whose compensation is now being determined by now existing wage boards."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK and Mr. LONDON) there were—ayes 16, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 6, line 21, after the figure "3," insert the words "and who are employed within the District of Columbia."

Mr. BLACK. Now, Mr. Chairman, a few facts might be well understood with reference to the skilled trades. It was at their request that they were not classified, as were the employees who received the annual salary. The committee thought it wise—and, in fact, there was no suggestion to the contrary—that we set up a wage commission. These skilled trades now are regulated for the most part by wage boards. The fact of the matter is that the representative of the employees, Mr. N. P. Alifas, who now sits in the gallery, asked that a wage commission be set up. I quote his exact language from page 129 of the hearings on the reclassification bill. He said:

We believe that if a reclassification bill is going to be enacted it should provide for a wage board.

Now, the objection of Mr. Alifas and those Members of the House who seem to be following his views to the present provision is—and that is the only objection, so far as I know—that the decision of the wage board shall be subject to review by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. They do not want decisions as to these skilled trades reviewed by anybody, and I am amazed to see some Members of this House fall in with that view.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] in the remarks that he made says, "Why not let the head of the department have the final say as to what wages shall be paid to the skilled trades?"

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not say that. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. BLACK. "Why not trust it to the heads of the departments?" Did the gentleman not say that?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the gentleman misunderstood it. I said to leave it to the agents who are now deciding the question of wages in these various employments.

Mr. BLACK. That would mean you would leave it to some of the heads of the departments. In this bill we say that in the original instance the heads of the departments shall allocate the salaried employees, but in order that there may be system and uniformity about it we made the Bureau of the Budget the final reviewing authority. The House wisely accepted that. Why not do the same thing as to these skilled trades? Why not have the same system of uniform reviewing by the budget authority. I have no fears that under such procedure labor would not receive a square deal.

I recall that when we had the Cummins-Esch bill before the House some of these gentlemen who, when every bill comes before the House, assume to be the spokesmen for labor, vigorously opposed the creation of the Railroad Labor Board. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] was one of those who vigorously opposed it. And yet where would labor be to-day, and especially the unskilled labor on the railroads, without the protecting arm of that board? Strike this section 8 out if you want to, gentlemen, but you will not be doing any favor to labor when you do it. This provision contemplates that a wage commission be set up upon which commission the employees shall have one representative, and the decision of that wage commission is not left to the arbitrary decision of the heads of the departments, but is to be made up after careful hearings and investigation, and is subject only to the review and final decision of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

Now, if any gentleman can advance any reason in debate why we should not undertake to have some uniformity of the wages of the skilled trades, just as we try to have it as to the other civil employees, then I would like to hear him on the topic, and if we are to try to have any uniformity about it I would like to hear a better method suggested than the wage commission, with its decisions subject to review and revision by the Director of the Budget, the same authority which reviews, revises, and approves the allocation of the civil-service employees to their positions.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. There is an amendment pending that I want to oppose.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas is pending. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], gentlemen of the committee, seeks to limit the operation of this section to the District of Columbia and thus make it applicable to the employees of the navy yard and such other employees as work at skilled trades, presumably in the Printing Office, and in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and similar places. At present the wages are being fixed by law. In the navy yard they are being fixed by the board I have already spoken of. In other places they are being fixed, and, as I understand, being fixed satisfactorily. In any event, let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas that Congress always has it in its power to fix the wages of these people in a proper way.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think the committee would have discharged its duty if it had not undertaken a specific method for fixing the compensation of every employee in the Government of the District of Columbia?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is true, if the gentleman from Texas please, but you have not taken a specific method. You have taken a general method. Instead of fixing them yourselves, or attempting to make classifications under which these classes of employees might have come, you have sought to fix a labor board and let this board do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Texas has urged uniformity in his amendment; and if it is adopted, so that the wage board applies to employees in the District of Columbia, there will be little uniformity as to those in the country.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Men who work over here on the training grounds in Maryland, and in camps, and men who work in the arsenal in my district, and in the navy yards of California, would have no uniformity at all with what would be paid in the District; and we have a great commission of the Government fixing the wages of a few employees of the District and spending the money of the country in an unnecessary way, while other employees outside of the District have their wages fixed in an entirely different way. It does not occur to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas helps this in any way, and I hope it will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-two Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columba and in the field services, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed that the roll be called, whereupon 297 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted a list of absentees for printing in the Journal and in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was voted down.

Mr. BARKLEY. The point of order was not made on the vote on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment. The point of order was made on the vote on the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas made the announcement that he did not make the point of order on the vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The announcement does not affect the situation. The point of order was made on the vote on the amendment. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 6, line 21, after the figure "3," insert "and who are employed within the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks for a division.

Mr. LONDON. No; I will withdraw it.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], to strike out this section. I am in favor of that for several reasons, but mainly because the section itself is contradictory. This bill is intended to fix the salaries, and it says it fixes the salaries of the civil-service employees. In section 3 it limits the operation of the bill apparently to the employees here in the District of Columbia. In section 8 it contradicts itself and extends the operation of the bill to the entire country.

I call your attention to this language:

That, subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget, the rates of compensation of all employees to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable by section 3 hereof shall be fixed and readjusted from time to time by a board of three members to be known as the Federal Wage Commission.

That extends it to the entire country. That would make it apply in every arsenal and every navy yard in this country. You have already by law established the way to fix the salary or wages in your arsenals, in your quartermaster depots, in your navy yards. By that section you would establish another agency. You would create a commission here in Washington to fix the wages of the men employed in the arsenals all over the country. That commission would be in the Bureau of the Budget, which is already overworked. It is an absolutely new commission and knows nothing about the wages of the workmen in the arsenals and in the navy yards.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Does not the gentleman think that we already have too many bureaus, boards, and commissions, and that the administration now ought to consider the proposition of dissolving some of these superfluous commissions and boards and bureaus with a view to restoring the old-time régime?

Mr. HULL. I agree with the gentleman absolutely. There is no reason for the creation of a commission to do something for which you already have commissions all over this country that are doing it much better than they will do it under this bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the gentleman's position, it is that this section 8 extends the act generally to employees throughout the country.

Mr. HULL. It unquestionably does.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And the gentleman also takes the position that section 3 limits it to the District of Columbia?

Mr. HULL. Certainly. That is what it intended to do at the start.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out section 8.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 122, noes 9.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Civil Service Commission, after consultation with the heads of departments, shall establish uniform systems of efficiency rating for the various grades, which shall set forth the degree of efficiency which shall constitute ground for (a) increase in the rate of compensation for employees who have not attained the maximum rate of the class to which their positions are allocated, (b) continuance at the existing rate of compensation without increase or decrease, (c) decrease in the rate of compensation for employees who at the time are above the minimum rate for the class to which their positions are allocated, and (d) dismissal.

The head of the department shall rate, in accordance with such systems, the efficiency of each employee under his control or direction. Such current ratings for each grade shall be open to inspection by the representatives of the Civil Service Commission and by the employees of the department under conditions to be determined by the Civil Service Commission after consultation with the department heads.

The Civil Service Commission may require that one copy of such current ratings shall be transmitted to and kept on file with the commission.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers a motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Strike out section 9.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if you will examine this section you will find that it is not the purpose of the proponents of this bill to have the Civil Service Commission act in a simply advisory capacity, but it is intended that within the Civil Service Commission there shall be established all the machinery necessary to determine the matter of efficiency.

On yesterday there was a proposition made and an amendment proposed and adopted by the committee that the Bureau of the Budget might call upon the Bureau of Efficiency for advice with reference to the enforcement of this thing. Now, if you will read section 9 you will find that the Civil Service Commisssion, after consultation with the heads of the departments, shall establish uniform systems of efficiency rating for the various grades set forth herein; that the Civil Service Commission shall take upon itself the duty of establishing grades of efficiency for every one of the departments and every classification in this bill in every department.

Yesterday I called the attention of the committee, and I desire to call its attention again, for there are a few more members here now than there were yesterday, that when this efficiency law was first established, its administration was lodged in the Civil Service Commission. That was ineffective and of no avail, and in order that it might be of some consequence, in order that it might not prejudice the purposes for which the Civil Service Commission was created, Congress took the matter up in 1916 and an independent branch was established known as the Bureau of Efficiency. Now, inconsistent with the amendment that we adopted here yesterday, making it ineffective, the attempt is being made to place upon the Civil Service Commission the entire duty of formulating efficiency ratings in the different departments. Is there anything which would indicate that if it was a failure in 1912 down to 1916, it will be more effective under this law? Is there anything to induce any man here to think for a moment that the efficiency obtained through an independent institution will be more effectually obtained through the Civil Service Commission, and that that commission can do more toward establishing efficiency than the bureau whose entire duty it is to make efficiency prevail? One of the things urged against it then was that this extra duty was inconsistent with the duties of the Civil Service Commission, that the commission was appointed to make selections by examination, and that when the appointees were distributed among the various departments, it should be the work of another body to determine whether they were efficient or inefficient. It was destructive then of the good purposes of the Civil Service Commission. It will be destructive now.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The Civil Service Commission was established, and in the organic act creating it it was provided that it should be an independent and nonpartisan body. Does the gentleman think that the commission as now constituted is a body of that character?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not care to discuss that point. I want to keep to the text that we have immediately before us; but I do know this, that if you put this extra duty upon the Civil Service Commission, if there is any question now with reference to its skirts being clean, as to whether it is or is not nonpartisan, you are going to add tenfold opportunity for it to be less nonpartisan and more partisan than it now is. Why, you will have every friend of every man whose efficiency is in question, or who desires to have an efficiency rating other than that which has been accorded him by the head of the department under which he is working, logrolling and pulling by every influence possible at the coat tails of the members of this commission. It is the worst thing that could possibly happen to the commission. It is the worst thing that could possibly happen to the efficiency of the employees of this Government. It is as bad as the provision of this bill which charges the Bureau of the Budget with an equal responsibility with that of the Civil Service Commission with reference to allocation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I should like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It has been repeatedly said here—and I appeal to every friend of the Bureau of the Budget—that if you wish to have this budget system the success we hope it to be you will not encumber it by placing this additional duty upon it. If it is your purpose to destroy the Bureau of the Budget, to break it down before it is really standing alone, you can best accomplish it by putting upon it the responsibility provided for in this bill. I know that the budget officers do not want it. They have told me repeatedly that they think it is destructive of the very purpose for which the Bureau of the Budget was established. Therefore we should consider well not only the item to which I have called attention, but if you will read the bill from start to finish you will find it is a conglomeration of inconsistencies not only with reference to the grades established and the definitions under which they are placed, but it will entail an expense additional to that which we have now that can not be calculated by anybody here and which can only be ascertained by putting it into force. You will find that under this provision it is possible for every one with a little bit of influence outside to get within the preferred class. They have established more professors and made it possible for there to be more professors in these positions than the founders of the Government ever dreamed of. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana has made this identical speech within the last four days on every section of this bill, but nevertheless it is necessary to make a reply. Section 9 provides for a system of efficiency within the civilian service of the Government. A mere classification equalizing and readjusting compensation is ineffective as a measure of economy and efficiency without a system whereby the employees themselves are held accountable for the greatest measure of service that can reasonably and fairly be required of them. In some of the departments efficiency systems and ratings based upon them already obtain. Section 9 provides that this shall be made uniform throughout the service, and in order to establish uniformity and fairness there must necessarily be a supervision lodged in some responsible heads. There is no desire to create any new department or subdepartment of the Government. For that reason the framers of the bill cast about among the existing departments of the Government for one suited both by experience and character of work now done and by material gathered in the past to do this work. The Civil Service Commission, as I said earlier in the afternoon when a similar attack was made by the gentleman from Indiana, has a complete analysis of the duties of every class of employees in the civil service; it has a complete analysis of the qualifications necessary to perform these duties. It has upon its rolls the name of every single employee in the service and the position he holds and the duties he is to perform and the qualifications he had when he entered the service, whether it was yesterday or 10 years ago. Manifestly with that information and with the experience in examinations and with the acquaintance with the duties of the position, the Civil Service Commission is the only body that can pass intelligently on the system of measuring the efficiency with which these duties are performed.

To substitute the Bureau of Efficiency is to scrap the entire plant of the Civil Service Commission and to direct the Bureau of Efficiency to build up this great mass of information over again.

The Bureau of Efficiency in the past has revised the bookkeeping methods of the Treasury, installed system in the Postal Service, and has installed working efficiency in different divisions and bureaus. But it has had nothing to do with passing on the quality of the service of the individual employee. The only bureau that has had such functions is the Civil Service Commission, and while we have to have some unifying supervising force it would be folly to choose another body or commission except the one that has in the last years done this work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 5, page 7, the words "Civil Service Commission" and insert "Bureau of Efficiency."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 5, strike out the words "Civil Service Commission" and in lieu thereof insert the words "Bureau of Efficiency."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. For what purpose?

Mr. LEHLBACH. To make a request for unanimous consent to limit debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not heretofore abused the privileges of the House, and I shall only take five minutes. It may be that other gentlemen desire to speak after hearing my remarks, as I was induced to offer the amendment after hearing the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey admits that there has been put in force in certain departments efficiency rating systems whereby the efficiency of the governmental service has been established. There has been only one agency that has attempted that and has perfected it. That is the Bureau of Efficiency. The Bureau of Efficiency has put into force in the Post Office Department and various divisions of the Treasury a system of efficiency rating. Not only that, but I hold in my hand a classification schedule of employees in the District of Columbia with the ratings prepared by the Bureau of Efficiency. Now, it is proposed to establish in the Civil Service an agency and pile upon them a work that has never been performed by the commission up to this time.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. ELLIS. Is it not true that the Civil Service Commission is behind with its work?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not only that but the Appropriations Committee from time to time has come to the relief of the Civil Service Commission by allowing additional employees to do the work within their proper jurisdiction. Whoever heard that the Civil Service Commission has ratings as to the efficiency of the clerks in the respective bureaus?

I never heard of it, and I do not believe anyone else ever heard of that in respect to the Civil Service Commission. It is foreign to their work. It is something that you are going to impose on them, and in the effort to make them a judicial body, to pass on the merits of promotions, demotions, and dismissals, with their real work of administration, they will become a political body by this proposal in section 9.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. If the duties as construed under section 9 are to be placed on the Civil Service Commission, does the gentleman not think the next thing in order would be a bill to repeal the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. STAFFORD. There will be little work for the Bureau of Efficiency to do, but we would not be able to get such a bill through, because the Bureau of Efficiency is a member of a historic family. Once you establish a bureau, you can rarely have it cease functioning. We appropriate $125,000 a year for the Bureau of Efficiency. Is anyone here contending that they have not done their work efficiently? No; they have done it so well that some other commission that has not had this work now desires to take it on. It is proverbial and also historical that no commission ever refuses any work when the purpose is to magnify its power. I do not deny that the Civil Service Commission wishes to have further power. There is not a bureau nor a division of the Government that does not want to amplify its power. The Bureau of Efficiency have had experts throughout the country to determine what shall be the rating and to what grades these clerks shall be assigned. Why should we now, when we are projecting a bill that will in three years add $20,000,000 to the pay roll in increased appropriation for the civilian lists of the Government, add several hundred thousand dollars more in order to provide machinery whereby this can be accomplished when you have existing machinery already in the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it conceded that this bill will add to the pay roll $20,000,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. That has not been conceded—I have not heard any concession to that effect—but it will cost $10,000,000, and it is conceded and the gentleman knows that when he surrenders to the decision of departments the fixing of the salaries, that while it will cost only $10,000,000 if enforced in the medium grades, in the maximum grades it will cost $20,000,000 and there is where they will go in a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to offend to the extent of asking an extension of time, but with the consent of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] I shall ask to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his request.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I was not going to object to his having three additional minutes. I was merely going to see whether at that time some arrangement for completing debate could not be made. The gentleman may continue for three minutes so far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has withdrawn his request. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEHLBACH) there were—ayes 25, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to strike out the section.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That, subject to such rules and regulations as the Civil Service Commission may from time to time prescribe, an employee may be transferred from a position in one grade to a vacant position within the same grade at the same rate of compensation, or promoted to a vacant position in a higher grade at a higher rate of compensation, any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize or permit the transfer of an employee of the United States to a position under the municipal government of the District of Columbia, or an employee of the municipal government of the District of Columbia to a position under the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I find in section 10 the following language:

any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Would that relate to past laws or to future laws? What is the purpose of it? What does it mean and what is the need for it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is in the nature of repealing existing law which is in conflict with this section.

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary to put such a provision in a repeal of a law, if it be in conflict with this section, because this section becomes a new law and any law that is in conflict with it is to that extent repealed without any such provision.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But under the canon of construction that statutes should be construed if possible so that both statutes may stand, it was thought best to include such a provision. It is merely a safeguard. It may not be necessary and probably is not necessary, but it was deemed for the purposes of certainty or assurance best to put it in.

Mr. MANN. This whole bill is a change of law. It is the creation of a new law. Section 10 contains positive revisions in reference to transfers from one grade to another, of promotions. We do not carry such a provision in other sections of the bill. Suppose Congress hereafter, without specifically repealing this provision, should provide for an appointment or transfer or promotion, might it not then be claimed that it will not have any effect because here is a provision stating that so-and-so should be the law, any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Later statutes govern, and the express provisions of those statutes will be carried out.

Mr. MANN. If this bill becomes a law and is in effect and is in conflict with some prior statute, that statute is no longer the law. This is the law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think the words are not essential.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, beginning in line 9, on page 8, I move to strike out the words "any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 8, line 9, after the word "compensation," strike out the words "any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not resist the amendment. I am rather of the opinion that the language is not at all necessary, but I know why it was inserted. During the war stress we were losing a great many of our experts in certain grades who were being advanced to upper grades. In order to prevent this practice an appropriation bill had inserted in it a provision forbidding it. I thought at the time that it was a very unfortunate piece of legislation to governmentally forbid the promotion of an employee from one grade to another if his ability was such that he ought to be promoted, and if the upper grade wanted to use him. However, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, at that time Mr. Fitzgerald, pointed out that many of our grades were losing their best people, and that some of the grades were draining the lower grades of the best men they had.

Therefore we wrote that provision in the appropriation bill. I thought it was a very unwise thing to do. I think that is why this language was used.

Mr. MANN. I think I understand the reason why. I thought there ought not to be any question of a complication with a prior statute. Suppose instead of saying "any provision of the law to the contrary notwithstanding," we should say "any provision of an existing statute."

Mr. FESS. That would reach it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out, in line 10, page 8, the words "any law" and insert in lieu thereof the words "existing statute."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 10, strike out the words "any law" and in lieu thereof insert the words "existing statute."

Mr. DEMPSEY. There certainly can not be any constitutional provision or common law on the subject, so the change must be simply a change of verbiage and not a change of substance.

Mr. MANN. Well, this as it reads might be claimed to apply to a law hereafter passed by the Congress which did not specifically repeal this.

Mr. DEMPSEY. We could not by any possibility restrict the passage of future laws.

Mr. MANN. We could not restrict the passage of a future law at all, but suppose the future law be passed which does not repeal this——

Mr. DEMPSEY. In express terms.

Mr. MANN. Which does not purport to repeal it. Here is a provision that if there is any such provision of law this shall be the case, and I do not think it ought to be complicated that way. I do not think there is very great difficulty about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the necessary number of words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. DUNBAR. I wish to address my remarks to the chairman of the committee. Under the provisions of this bill what civilian employees of the Government of the United States outside of the District of Columbia are exempt from its provisions? Are there any?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There are no employees of any kind outside the District of Columbia who are embraced in the classification and the ranges of salaries known as the compensation schedules, but section 5 provides for the making of a similar classification and the application of analogous salary ranges to the field services, which classification, when made, is to be reported back to the Congress for its action.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then the bill provides for a further classification of employees outside the District of Columbia and any classification that might be made under the provisions of this bill would not become operative without congressional action?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Without congressional action; correct.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask for permission to speak for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman rises in opposition to the motion to strike out.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I want to ask the Chairman if this cures a certain condition that has recently existed. Without mentioning the employee's name, I will give an instance in which there was an employee under the civil service, a man of education, who performed his duties well in his department for many years. Incidentally, I may say the head of the department was changed and he found occasion to reduce him from about $1,600 to about $900 a year. Time goes on, he is still efficient, another bureau head comes in and raises him to his old salary again. Can those things happen under this bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; because the present employee would be allocated to a grade in the service that his duties would call for. He would then be subject to a test as to his efficiency, and he can be neither increased in salary nor decreased in salary nor dismissed from the service unless the work that he is performing merits either a reward or punishment, so he is protected against unreasonable, unfair, and arbitrary disturbance in his job. But if, as is now the case, his work is not up to standard, while under present conditions he is allowed to slack along from year to year, it would be mandatory on the bureau chief, if his work was of such slight unsatisfactoriness as merely to justify it, he would be reduced in pay, and if his services were thoroughly worthless it would be mandatory on the bureau chief to dismiss him from the service. On the other hand, if his work is such a conspicuous fitness and efficiency that it would merit an increase in pay as provided for, if Congress should appropriate for such increase—and thereby Congress always has a check on that—he would get the increase, and such salary increases as are now constantly made would be made on the basis of efficiency and not at the whim of his immediate superior.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the compensation schedules be as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he has arrived at any conclusion as to the method of considering the remaining part of the bill, which comprises 28 pages and is included in one section?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I have only considered that the rules of the committee govern; that is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was going to make the suggestion to the committee as to whether it would not be better to try to consider it, possibly, by grades of professional service, so that the committee could consider each grade by itself, rather than read over 28 pages and have, maybe, 125 or 150 paragraphs open to amendment. It does not tend to good parliamentary consideration to have these various matters in 28 pages, including, maybe, 125 paragraphs, considered at one time. I merely offer it as a suggestion.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, in considering section 12 under the rules for amendment, and in reading it, that each service shall be considered a section—shall be read and then be subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] asks unanimous consent that in the consideration of section 12 each service heading may be read and considered as a section for amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an inquiry. At the proper time I desire to move to strike out all after line 21 and substitute entire new matter. I do not know whether I shall do that at the end of the reading of the first subhead or wait to get through. I do not care to interfere with any plan here so long as I have my rights.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think, pending my unanimous-consent request, that we ought further to agree that if a substitute for the entire section is offered it should be offered upon the completion of the consideration of the existing section; in other words, when the last service has been completed. Otherwise, should his motion prevail the bill as reported by the committee would not be before the Committee of the Whole House for consideration at all.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman from Indiana agrees to that, and that is incorporated as a part of my unanimous-consent request, that a motion to substitute the matter for the entire section shall come upon the completion of the last service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that in the consideration of section 12 each paragraph under the service heads shall be considered for amendment as a separate section; that upon the completion thereof any motion to strike out the language of the entire section and substitute new language shall be deferred until the completion of the various paragraphs of the section. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, does that prevent the customary practice of offering a complete substitute for all after the reading of the first section and giving notice that if adopted the remaining sections will be stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands it. The Chair understood the request of the gentleman from New Jersey to the effect that if the gentleman from Indiana had a proposed amendment it would strike out all after the language in the first line of the section and substitute new language for that section.

Mr. WINGO. I could not hear the colloquy.

The CHAIRMAN. And it is asked now, if it be agreed to, that such an amendment be deferred until the entire section has been considered, each service heading paragraph being considered as a separate paragraph for amendment.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, the section will be divided into paragraphs?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Service heads.

Mr. WINGO. That is what I mean. I mean that the substitute will be last.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. The Clerk will read the first paragraph under the service heads.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROFESSIONAL SERVICE.

The professional service shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to perform apprentice, routine, advisory, administrative, or research work which is based upon the established principles of, and which require training in, a recognized profession. Positions in the following callings, when requiring professional training equivalent to that represented by graduation from a college or university of recognized standing, shall be regarded as in the professional service: Accountancy, agricultural economics and marketing, architecture, astronomy, bacteriology, biology, chaplaincy, chemistry, child hygiene, civil-service examining, dentistry, dietetics, economics, education, engineering, forestry, geology, history, law, library science, mathematics, medicine, metallurgy, meteorology, patent examining, pathology, pharmacology, physics, political science, social economics, statistics, therapeutics, translating, and veterinary science. The specific mention of these callings, however, shall not be construed to exclude other callings which are to an equal degree professional.

Grade 1, which may be referred to as the junior professional grade, shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to perform under immediate supervision the simplest kinds of work requiring professional training.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $1,800, $1,920, $2,040, and $2,160.

Grade 2, which may be referred to as the assistant professional grade, shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to perform under general direction assigned professional work requiring professional training and previous experience but not the exercise of independent judgment.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $2,340, $2,520, $2,700, and $2,880.

Grade 3, which may be referred to as the associate professional grade, shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to perform independently or with a small number of subordinates in the junior or assistant professional grade, or with other subordinates, responsible professional work requiring extended training and considerable successful previous experience.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $3,120, $3,360, $3,600, and $3,840.

Grade 4, which may be referred to as the full professional grade, shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to perform independent and highly expert professional work, or to be responsible for the administration of a minor division of a large organization, or a major division of a small organization doing such work.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $4,140, $4,440, $4,740, and $5,040.

Grade 5, which may be referred to as the senior professional grade, shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to act as assistant head of a large professional organization, or as administrative head of a major division of such an organization, or as head of a small professional organization, or to serve as a consulting specialist, or to carry on the most advanced professional research.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $5,400, $5,700, and $6,000, unless a higher rate is specifically authorized by law.

Grade 6, which may be referred to as the chief professional grade, shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to act as technical and administrative head of a major professional or scientific bureau.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $6,000, $6,600, and $7,200, unless a higher rate is specifically authorized by law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the committee in charge of this bill I submit the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

The committee proposes to offer a series of amendments to diminish the salaries originally recommended by the committee as proper salaries.

This particular amendment deals with the salaries of the professional service.

I am opposed to the amendment.

Extensive hearings, lasting a month, were had on this bill. Representatives of numerous organizations, speaking for almost every branch of the service, appeared in support of the bill. I take it that the principal reason for their support of the bill were the salaries which the bill fixed. They are less interested in the problem of reclassification than in the question of dollars and cents—in the question of the livelihood which they will be able to obtain by working for the Government.

I look upon these hearings, at which the employees of the Government appeared in advocacy of the salaries scheduled in the bill, as possessing almost the sanctity of an agreement with these employees. They do not strike against the Government. They do not take any form of aggressive collective action against their employer, the Government. They appear before a committee; they present their side; they examine the salaries which are offered to them; they pass their judgment. The committee approves. They express their satisfaction, although some protest that the salaries fixed are too small.

After the committee had reported the bill, and after it had been taken up for consideration, for some reason which I can not understand, the committee has decided to reduce these salaries by substantial sums. The only possible explanation of the committee's action is that those members of the committee who voted for this reduction feared that the bill might be defeated in case they did not consent to a reduction.

They yielded to the general cry for a reduction of salaries, for a reduction of wages. They feared that the outside industrial world and the outside business world would condemn the action of Congress if Congress were not now to follow the footsteps of our industrial magnates in taking advantage of the present industrial depression and were not to reduce the earnings of those who are compelled to work for a living.

I can not share the fear of the committee on that subject. I take it that the salaries of the Government employees are far below the minimum necessary to sustain life with any degree of comfort. I take it that particularly men in the professional branches of the service are shamefully underpaid.

Now, take these professional services that we are dealing with. It embraces every branch of scientific endeavor, the very highest sphere of intellectual activity. You have astronomy there, and biology, and bacteriology, and education, history, law, mathematics. I recall one of these scientists in the employ of the Government who is a world-known figure. I recall his testimony before the committee. I felt tears coming to my eyes when I heard him testify that he had been compelled to mortgage his home in order to meet the growing cost of living during the last few years—a sad state of affairs. And while the man of science is not and should not be devoted to money making, no Government can afford to treat men of science in the manner in which this Government has been treating its professional employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask for another five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Now, gentlemen, you all know that the so-called bonus was a mere guess. You guessed at 20 per cent. It was one of those political guesses, like Mr. Bryan's guess of 16 to 1. It happened to be 20 per cent; not 22½ per cent or 19¾ per cent; just 20 per cent. But it had no relation to the actual purchasing power of the dollar.

On yesterday everybody, I think, agreed with me that the disparity between the nominal dollar and the real dollar—that is, the nominal dollar and the purchasing power of the dollar—was three times as great as 20 per cent. Somebody asked me the date of the statistical data that I relied on. I stated that the statistical data were of 1920.

I have now before me statistical data relating to the cost of living, which take us up to September, 1921, up to the very last minute, practically; and what do we find? Taking the city of Boston, for example, we find that between 1914 and 1921 the cost of food had increased 52.1 per cent; the cost of clothing, 118.8 per cent; housing, 31.6 per cent.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman mean from 1917?

Mr. LONDON. I mean from 1914 to 1921. I am quoting from page 78 of the monthly Labor Review for November, 1921. Housing, I said, increased 31.6; fuel and light, 94.4; furniture and furnishing, 139.5; and miscellaneous, 94.6, making an average of 72.8 per cent increase since 1914.

In New York the increase is 79.7; in Mobile, Ala., 67.2; in Washington, D. C., 66.2.

Under these circumstances we should not think of decreasing the salaries of the men whose only means of livelihood comes from their serving the Government. I am not making this argument just for the sake of making an argument. Every professional man in the House who accepts fees for services rendered charges now a great deal more than 20 per cent additional for the service he performs. Every professional man pays to his office help more than 20 per cent above what he was paying in 1914. The salaries that were originally fixed in this bill were based on a slight increase over the old salary, plus the bonus, an increase which, as the commission estimated, would involve an additional expenditure of 8.5 per cent. That is, assuming that there would be no economy, assuming that there would be no elimination of useless workers, assuming that there would be no gain through higher efficiency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hold in my hand the table inserted by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] showing the increase in these various grades of professional services, on page 172 of the RECORD. I direct the gentleman's attention to grades 3 and 4, as to the increases of compensation, using the median rate. It is 28.5 for grade 3, and 44.2 for grade 4. How does the gentleman harmonize that with his 8.5 per cent?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. I did not quite get the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman was addressing himself to the professional service?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. That 8.5 per cent applied to the entire service.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman in his remarks to say that the average increase of the professional service would be only 8.5 per cent.

Mr. LONDON. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman was addressing his protest entirely in the interest of the men of science in the professional grades.

Mr. LONDON. We are dealing now with this amendment, and I confine my remarks to this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. That relates only to the professional service. I am calling attention to the fact that the increase to the professional grades is much more than the 8.5 per cent which the gentleman stated.

Mr. LONDON. The 8.5 per cent related to the entire civil service.

Now, when you speak of comparisons with the outside business world you realize, of course, that the business world is never actuated by any higher motive than that of making money, and in those industries where there is intense competition the meanest man controls the situation; the will of the meanest employer is supreme. The man who can get his employees for the lowest wage and under the worst possible conditions has the greatest chance of survival. There you have the law of the survival of the fittest working in the sense of the survival of the meanest as a rule. That is what the law of the survival of the fittest means there. And where industry is monopolized the worker is altogether helpless.

But that should not be made to apply to the delicate relations between the Government and its employees. It is an extremely difficult proposition. The personal relation between employer and employee does not exist in the Government service. There is no feeling of friendship, no intimate knowledge of the individual. There is an absence of the human element. The Government as an employer is an abstraction. Unless the worker feels that his livelihood is secured by the Government, unless he feels he is getting a square deal from the Government, you can not inspire him with that desire to render the best service which is so necessary in order that the service may be efficient.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Does the gentleman include the bonus of $240 in the basic salary upon which he makes his computation of an average 8.5 per cent increase?

Mr. LONDON. I do include the so-called guess, which was called the bonus; yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is, the $240 is included?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; the $240 added to a wage originally fixed 30 years ago.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then the salary would be the former salary plus the bonus, and then there is a gain of 8.5 per cent.

Mr. LONDON. A general increase of 8½ per cent.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I wanted to get that point clear.

Mr. LONDON. Yes; but when you will realize that the ordinary expenditures of the Government constitute only 7 or 8 per cent of our total budget, and that 93 per cent goes for the expense arising out of the war, you will see that the committee wants us to be penny-wise. You will injure the entire service of the Government if you yield to the cry of the outside world for reducing wages, for grinding down the men who work, for ruthlessness in the relation between employer and employee. Congress instead of being the leader in good morals as between employer and employee is asked to succumb to the general cry of the industrial rulers, whose only ideal is gold.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. The force of the gentleman's argument appeals to me so much that I almost hesitate to ask him what seems to me to be a pertinent question; yet I can not help desiring to know how he reconciles that argument with the system of philosophy for which, I understand, he is sponsor, under which we are to be paid not according to our deserts but according to our needs?

Mr. LONDON. I do not quite get the gentleman's question. Probably the gentleman has his own conception of what my philosophy is. I do not believe he understands my philosophy. If the gentleman will be kind enough to ask some day that I be given an hour to explain my philosophy, or if he will be patient enough to read a list of books which I shall be glad to give him, then I will discuss with him my philosophy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the increase in compensation which would have resulted from the compensation schedules in the bill as originally reported, on the basis of comparison with the service as it was both in numbers and average salary in April, 1919, would have been, over the then conditions, 8.5 per cent, or something in excess of $8,000,000. However, since 1919 the number of employees in the District of Columbia has been reduced by 21,000. The average salary was something over $1,400. That would mean a decrease in the pay roll for the District of something in the neighborhood of $30,000,000. Furthermore, the only figures that we have as to the pay roll in departments in the District of Columbia at the present time are those furnished through the Committee on Appropriations, which is the second table in the figures which I inserted in the RECORD on page 227 of the RECORD of December 9, 1921, and which show an average salary, instead of $1,457, of $1,593. Whether those figures, which are by departments, are exactly comparable with figures by services it is impossible to determine exactly, but as a general basis of comparison they ought to be reliable, because they were furnished the Committee on Appropriations, I understand, by the Bureau of Efficiency. That shows an average increase in salary for District employees of over $100 in the last two years. That shows that there is a substantial increase at least over the salary in 1919, and that in large measure, I think, is accounted for by the fact that in the lowest entrance salary in the statutory grade the lowest range of salary has been rather generally disregarded and people are no longer starting in the service at $720 or $900, but start up somewhere about $1,000 at the present time. That is the reason for the average higher pay. But the decrease in the employees and the increase in the salary would make the discrepancy between the salaries reported in the compensation schedules originally and present compensation materially less than 8 per cent, materially less than $8,000,000, and would reduce it to between three and five million dollars, and there is no justification—nobody has any figures, nobody has any moral right to say that this bill at any time, at present or in the future, would cost $20,000,000, or anything like it. Such statements are unjustifiable and are made in reckless disregard of ascertainable facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the Civil Service Commission any data as to what the increases will be under this bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. As far as I know, none whatever, excepting such information as is available to all those who have studied the facts reported by the Reclassification Commission and have endeavored to bring them down to date.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I understood by a publication recently that we have reduced the employees here to 78,000?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The employees on November 15 in the District of Columbia were a few hundred in excess of 69,000. There has been a reduction of over 5,200 in the number of employees in the last four months, and that ratio of reduction is hoped to be continued for some time to come.

Mr. FESS. Did I not understand the gentleman to say some moments ago that we had 90,000 here?

Mr. LEHLBACH. In 1919, on April 30, as of which date these tables are computed, we had 90,815 employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FESS. Sixty-nine thousand shows some progress in reduction.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is a reduction of over 21,000.

Mr. FESS. Can we hope for further reductions?

Mr. LEHLBACH. We can under normal conditions, without any legislation; but if we reorganize the departments, which this Brown Commission is endeavoring to do, and we complement that work with the reclassification of the personnel, we can make drastic reductions in the personnel in every department of the Government and save money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. As I recall it, we had 37,000 employees in 1917 when we went into the war.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I believe that is correct.

Mr. FESS. And our present number is pretty nearly double that.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. My concern is whether that increase is so substantial that we can not reduce to anywhere near the number we had formerly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Additional activities, which resulted from the war, which are not activities for carrying on war but for carrying on activities which resulted from the war—our immense War Risk Insurance, the Veterans' Bureau, the great increase in the handling of the new conditions in respect of finances in the Treasury, and so forth—will necessarily mean a substantial permanent increase over the 37,000 that there were, but there ought to be a very substantial reduction from the 69,000 which to-day are still in the service in the District.

Notwithstanding the fact that the increase as originally reported in the bill was a slight increase and would in comparison to the entire cost of the service of the Government and the expenditures of Government be negligible, nevertheless, sensing the sentiment of the House that there should be not any increase in the pay roll, not any increase in the cost of maintaining the civil service of the Government, your committee has given further study to the subject and has brought in a revision of the compensation schedules which insure that in the first fiscal year in which these schedules are put into effect the pay roll would be less than it would be without the adoption of the classification, for the reason that while there is no substantial reduction made in the pay of existing employees, who are in jobs, in very many instances, generally throughout the service, the entrance salary will be less than the present salary plus the bonus. In other words, where people now enter the service at $1,140, they will enter the service at $1,080. When you consider the thousands of turnover we have had and the thousands of new entrants constantly coming into the service, and that we are making a substantial reduction in the entrance salary in practically all the services, we have that element of saving, entirely aside from that element of saving which would come from a reduction in the personnel. In consequence, assuming the number to remain static, we would have our cost of maintenance of the civil service reduced, and, further, we would have this situation, that whatever reduction in the personnel is achieved, would be an actual saving to the Treasury and would not be absorbed by the salaries paid to others.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is the initial effect of this reclassification as revised.

Mr. FESS. Does this bill cover all the employees here in Washington?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman means compensation schedules? All with the exception of the skilled trades and skilled labor which are now not compensated in accordance with either statute or departmental regulations, but which are now compensated by wage boards which take into account from time to time such fluctuations as the market price of those wages may show.

Mr. FESS. Are there any employees attached to war agencies that were created and that still exist that are not included in this bill, such as the Shipping Board?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; they are all in the bill.

Mr. FESS. So that the danger of lump-sum appropriations with power to fix salaries is eliminated?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Nowadays a bureau chief might ask for a lump-sum appropriation to run his division. He might say, "I want $5,000,000 for certain purposes." If he got that sum, he was not compelled to spend it for those purposes, but could take and spend it in any way within his department, provided he did not exceed the $5,000,000, and could expend it by paying high salaries. But when the personnel is classified and they are put into the grades of services and their salary ranges fixed, he can not change the salary by raising anybody except on the bases of efficiency supervised by competent authority.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman said when they are classified.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I mean when they are allocated. This bill establishes the classification, and it is up to the department heads, under the final say so of the Bureau of the Budget, to assign their personnel to the proper grades in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has again expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey during the course of his remarks stated that no one had any right to make any accusation in reference to the increases this bill will entail upon the Government. I have before me, and with the consent of this body I will incorporate it in the RECORD for the edification of this committee, a table which shows the complete application of this bill to the Treasury Department in the city of Washington, its present cost of operation, the cost of operation if the Lehlbach bill becomes a law, and the cost of operation if the so-called Wood-Smoot bill becomes a law. There are some very striking figures. The largest activity within the Treasury Department is the Internal Revenue Office. The present cost of that office is $12,578,770. Under the reclassification as proposed in the pending measure it would be $15,658,020, or an increase of $1,079,250, or an increase of 8.6 per cent. Under the so-called Wood-Smoot bill the cost under the reclassification would be $12,667,780, or a minus of $80,930 as compared with the present cost, or under the application of the Wood-Smoot bill it would cost six-tenths of 1 per cent less than it is now costing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman intend to explain how that reduction is allocated to the various grades in the Treasury Department—whether in the higher ones or whether those in the lower grades are promoted to higher salaries? Whether there is any uniform increase in the salary of clerks?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It includes all clerks, all labor of the different offices under the present salary schedule, the entire cost under the Lehlbach schedule, if adopted, and the entire cost assuming the Wood-Smoot bill is adopted.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman explain how the allocation of positions in the Treasury Department to the grade by the Wood bill can be made when the range of salaries for each grade in some cases is from $1,500 to $2,000? How can anybody tell where in that range any particular person is to be allocated?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I take very great delight in telling the gentleman. If the gentleman had taken the time to examine the records we had here the other day, or will take the time to examine them now, he will see full well how it was accomplished; how under the direction of the President to the Bureau of Efficiency certain pay was established under its definitions of service. Those salaries so fixed by the Bureau of Efficiency as a result of its survey are the figures that are used in making this calculation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Then those salaries that are applicable to the Treasury Department under the Wood bill were entirely fixed by the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They were fixed because of the fact the salaries came in the definition saying how the salaries should be placed. That is just the trouble with this bill. Nobody will ever know where you are under this bill, because there is not any concrete definition so that anybody can be held to it if they have a mind to get out of it. The total cost to the Government of the Treasury Department, to which this applies, is $34,252,111.61.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The total cost under the Lehlbach bill will be $36,315,517.28, or an increase for the entire operation of the Treasury Department of $2,063,400.59, or a total cost applying to the entire department of an increase of 6 per cent, while the total cost, if the Wood bill were applied, would be plus $342,099; that is, it would increase the cost more than the present cost by 1 per cent. Now, gentlemen, much has been said here about the Wood bill, and they have attempted to use that bill as a buffer against the arguments adduced in opposition to the passage of this bill. I claim no pride of authorship so far as the Wood-Smoot bill is concerned. I introduced it because I believe, as everyone else here feels, that we should have a reclassification. When I introduced it the indications were, and we all hoped, that there would be a reduction in the cost of living, whereby the dollar would be made to go further than it was then going and approach somewhere near the point where it was when we entered upon this war. But I wish again to say to you, gentlemen, that this is the worst time possible to increase statutory salaries permanently, and if I were asked the question whether you should this day substitute this Wood-Smoot bill for this bill, which very materially increases the cost of government over the so-called Wood-Smoot bill, and adopt the Wood-Smoot bill, I would say no, because of the fact that these prices are still ranging so high that they are abnormal and must certainly remain abnormal for some time at least.

And if we are to do the best we can for the Treasury of this country, if we are to keep the promises we have made to the taxpayers of this country, we should put forth the best possible effort to lighten the burden of taxation. Why should we insist, and take the bit in our mouths and run away with this proposition? Why is this extraordinary demand now for the passage of this bill? Why is it so strongly urged that it pass at this particular hour? Because the gentlemen who are most vitally interested in it now know that if they can fix the base salary proposed, based upon the conditions now existing, they will have permanent salaries that will remain when the living prices become lower.

And there is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of this body. During all this investigation that was made preparatory to this reclassification what they had in mind was influenced by those extraordinary prices, and suggesting there be fixed upon this Government a schedule of salaries that no one, I care not who he might be, would have cared to have defended prior to the time we got into this war.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. What would the gentleman say as to the comparative cost of running the government of the District of Columbia if this becomes a law as it is written and the present cost of running the government with the bonus?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, as I say, if the Lehlbach bill became the law and took the place of the present statutory salaries with the bonus, for the operation of the Treasury Department for one year it would increase the cost of that operation $2,063,400.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman take the lower pay or the medium pay or the higher pay in making his calculation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It takes into consideration the entire personnel of each division and it separates them and calculates the cost upon the personnel as now paid and contrasts what the same personnel would cost under the Lehlbach bill and under the so-called Wood bill.

Mr. TILSON. Under the Lehlbach bill there are several sums appropriated within the same grade——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have an additional five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. There are several different sums within the same grades. There are sometimes three and sometimes four different amounts paid. Which of those does the gentleman take in the various grades, or has he averaged them in getting at the cost of the Lehlbach bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state to the gentleman—and I want to be entirely accurate about it——

Mr. TILSON. I am asking for information. The House wishes information.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not want to make a mistake about that, and I will give the correct information later during the debate, so that there will not be any mistake upon what the calculation was made. I wish again to say that it occurs to me that, if we were acting wisely and were wanting some time to get an intelligent reclassification that might stand and meet the approval not only of this body but of this country, that has to pay for it, we had better defer the passage of this or any other bill at this time.

We have managed to get through in an unscientific way ever since the cost of living has been mounting higher and higher. If we adopt this sort of a scheme, such as is proposed in this bill, we are fastening upon the Government an unequally unscientific scheme. It is best illustrated by what has occurred here in the last few minutes, when it was proposed arbitrarily to reduce each one of the salaries in this first section that was read by 10 per cent. Why 10 per cent?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is not 10 per cent, if the gentleman will yield. It varies in the different services, as the gentleman will ascertain if he will look at the figures.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. How much is it if it is not 10 per cent?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It comes about to 10 per cent, but it is not a uniform 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My information is that it amounts to a 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. LEHLBACH. These figures, I will say to the gentleman, have been in the RECORD since December 9. If the gentleman was interested, he could have looked at them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman say it is not a 10 per cent reduction?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I say it is not a uniform 10 per cent reduction.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The result of it is a reduction of 10 per cent. Is not that true?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is what it will amount to. The gentleman said each figure was reduced 10 per cent. That was a very incongruous way of reducing salaries.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think so, too. What hearings have you had since the reporting of this bill? What opportunity have you given the public or anybody interested to come before the committee and give them the benefit of their advice and counsel with reference to what that per cent should be, either decreased or increased?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the accusation of the gentleman mean that instead of making one guess of 10 per cent they have made several guesses?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what it amounts to. The point I am making is that it is a guess at best. It is a guess if you pass this bill as to how much the burden of the taxpayers of this country will be increased.

There is one thing, however, about which there may be no uncertainty and no guess, and that is if you fix these as the basic statutory salaries now they will remain permanently upon the statute books of this country for a long time, for in all the experience of the oldest man here you have never known salaries to be decreased. Their tendency is always to be higher and higher, and the efforts of those interested are constantly to increase them higher and higher.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert this schedule as part of my remarks.

Mr. BLACK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas—how much time does the gentleman from Texas desire?

Mr. BLACK. Five minutes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes, debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the debate on the committee amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have at least five minutes on this professional service title.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will modify my request and make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey modifies his request and now asks unanimous consent that all debate on the committee amendment and all amendments thereto terminate in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to reply briefly to the statement that has been frequently made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] that the work of preparing this bill and amendments was done without study and without due consideration.

Now I do not like to speak of the individual work that I have done in the study of this bill and will not speak of it except to say this: Some time ago I had the Civil Service Commission send me over the announcement digests of all examinations for 1921. There were about 40 of these, covering all sorts of positions in the Government service, examinations for which were advertised for during 1921; and in order to test out this bill and to see how it will work, as compared with the salaries paid now, I worked in my office every night last week until 10.30 or 11.30 o'clock, allocating these positions for my own information, in accordance with these announcement digests.

I do not have the time now to give the House the results of this study, but let me give you just one concrete illustration as applied to, for example, the professional service. The first four grades are comprised in the following: Grade (1) junior professional grade, grade (2) assistant professional grade, grade (3) associate professional grade, and grade (4) full professional grade.

Let us take the announcement digest issued February 10, 1921, by the Civil Service Commission for coal-mining engineer. That is one of the professions defined in this bill. The announcement digest advertises an examination for coal-mining engineer, associate coal-mining engineer, junior coal-mining engineer, and assistant coal-mining engineer. Let us see how the salaries in this civil-service announcemet list compare with the salaries as per the revised amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] which the committee studied out very carefully. Let us take junior engineer first as grade 1. Under the existing law as published in this announcement digest for junior coal-mining engineer the scale is from $1,500 to $2,000. Grade 1 in this bill is from $1,620 to $1,980 as per the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Let us take grade 2, assistant coal-mining engineer. In the Civil Service Announcement Digest that you can all read for yourselves, the one dated February 10, 1921, the salary of assistant coal-mining engineer, is from $2,000 to $3,000. In this bill grade 2, which is the assistant professional grade, is from $2,100 to $2,640, as per the Lehlbach amendment which is now pending.

Let us take the next one, the third professional grade, the associate professional grade. I read from the Announcement Digest of the Civil Service Commission. The salary of associate coal-mining engineer at the present time is from $3,000 to $4,000. The associate grade in this bill as per the Lehlbach amendment is from $2,820 to $3,540.

Let us take the full professional grade of coal-mining engineer.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Do these announcements of the Civil Service Commission include the bonus?

Mr. BLACK. These more highly paid employees do not get any bonus.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman cited one from $2,000 to $3,000.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; it announces at the bottom that each employee is entitled to a bonus up to $2,500, but the advertisement is the basic salary. Now, we will take the full professional grade, coal-mining engineer. Under the present law it is from $4,000 to $4,800, and in the Lehlbach bill it is $3,720 to $4,020. So, gentlemen, with these figures I have given you I do not think it can be said that our bill imposes an extravagant list of salaries. Of course, it will readily be admitted that there are other classes of professional employees, now very much underpaid, who will receive considerable increases under the salary schedules which we have named in our bill. But in this evening-up process the increases will not in any sense be extravagant or wasteful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was up for consideration in general debate I did not have the advantage of the tables that had been prepared for the use of the committee. I then stated that in many instances the salaries of employees of the Government were increased as high as 50 per cent and in some cases 100 per cent. The table that has been inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] confirms that statement, for in his original bill in grade 3 the total increase would be 28.5 per cent and in grade 4, 44.2 per cent.

Now, following the line of the argument just advanced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], he takes the salary, based not on the statutory roll but that which was fixed by the head of a bureau, out of a lump-sum appropriation. I want to call the attention of the committee to the salaries paid in those same grades based on the statutory roll. In the Bureau of Standards what do we find is paid to the assistant chemists? I do not know whether an assistant chemist is in grade 3 or in grade 2.

Mr. BLACK. He is in grade 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. The highest salary being paid to the assistant chemists of the Bureau of Standards, expert men selected by that rare head, Dr. Stratton, is $1,800; the other grades are $1,600 and $1,400, four at $1,800, six at $1,600, and six at $1,400. What is proposed to be done under the revised figures of the committee amendment in grade 2? The minimum will be $2,100 and up to $2,640.

Take the associate chemists or associate physicists. At present there are four grades—$2,700, $2,500, $2,200, and $2,000. Under the proposed amendment you start at $3,120, and the highest salary is $3,800. My experience on the legislative appropriating committee confirms my opposition to the method of lump-sum appropriations. That is what the proposed bill will result in by vesting in the heads of the departments the determination of the amounts of salaries that shall be paid, leaving it to the heads of the departments without any direct supervision by Congress.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have only five minutes. To-morrow, when I have more time, I will gladly yield to the gentleman. The Librarian of Congress often came before the Committee on Appropriations making his appeal to have salaries raised horizontally, and we declined, because we knew there were other factors to be taken into consideration besides the mere salary attached to a position in the Government service. We find these inordinate increases. Is there a man in this House who would vote to-day to increase the salaries of professional men so inordinately in these days when everyone is clamoring for a reduction, and when there are no withdrawals from the service? They have more applicants for Government positions at the Bureau of Standards than they have positions to fill, and yet it is proposed to increase their salaries radically by this bill, and not only in the minor grade. The average to which I called attention, of 44 per cent, is of the medium salary. One thing that has been brought to our attention time and time again is that the heads of bureaus and divisions always want to raise their men up to the higher salaries. There is no adequate agency provided in this bill which will be able to restrain them from raising the salaries to the maximum, nor is there any agency which will prevent the play of favoritism. We are surrendering our congressional control over these salaries. For years and years, ever since the existence of the Government, we have had control of them by voting upon them specifically. It is now proposed by this modern, scientific method of classification, which has been the vogue lately of increasing salaries in the field service, to increase these here. The powers that be were very potent in so far as the increase in the Postal Service employees was concerned, and now in a time of declining prices we are asked to raise salaries in the professional grades, where no vacancies exist and no impairment of the service has been reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DARROW: On page 9, line 11, following the word "pharmacology," insert the word "pharmacy," followed by a comma.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment so that the classification shall apply to the profession of pharmacy. It is the common term used and is understood to apply to that profession. As I understand it from those better qualified to judge, the word "pharmacology" has a more restricted meaning and applies more particularly to the study of the action of drugs. The term "pharmacy" is the common term used and understood by the American Pharmaceutical Association, the Conference of Pharmaceutical Faculties, the National Association of Retail Druggists, also by the Army and Navy, as well as in foreign countries.

Mr. FESS. Is pharmacology included in pharmacy?

Mr. DARROW. It may be the term "pharmacy" is broad enough to include the term "pharmacology," although I am not certain.

Mr. FESS. Why not strike out the word "pharmacology" and insert "pharmacy"?

Mr. DARROW. And yet "pharmacology," as I understand it, is applied more particularly to the study of the action of drugs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, to save gentlemen from entering into a long discussion on the relative meanings of those two words, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8928, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Has any agreement been entered into to dispense with the business in order on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday, to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman inform us whether the conferees on the deficiency appropriation bill have reached an agreement, and probably will reach an agreement in time to file under the consent given by 12 o'clock to-night?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that they probably will reach an agreement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may say that they did not meet until 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If they reach an agreement so as to file under the consent granted by 12 o'clock, I understand the conference report will be called up to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

CONFEREES ON DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as one of the conferees on the deficiency appropriation bill Mr. ANTHONY in place of Mr. CANNON, resigned.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 14, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

Whereas said agricultural bloc does not recognize party lines; and
Whereas said agricultural bloc has its representation from the South and West; and
Whereas its only purpose is to bring life back to a fast decaying and depleted agriculture; and
Whereas, if American agriculture is allowed to become depleted and the farms abandoned, that a most serious menace will confront this great Republic and will, if continued, finally place the United States in the history of the world alongside other great nations that have failed: Therefore be it

ESTIMATES OF COTTON PRODUCTION.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I do not believe in complaining, and I am not rising for that purpose; but I received this morning from a constituent of mine a letter calling my attention to the recent estimate of the Government of the amount of cotton being raised this year. This constituent complains very bitterly about the methods used and the inaccuracy of these reports.

For instance, in June, 1920, the department estimated that there would be 10,000,000 bales of cotton raised, and that year there were 13,340,000 bales produced. This constituent calls my attention to the fact that a day or two ago the department gave out an estimate of 8,340,000 bales being raised this year, whereas some two months ago it gave out an estimate of 6,500,000 bales. He calls my attention to the fact that 12 cotton firms in the United States made an estimate of the crop recently, and their combined estimate was 7,926,000 bales; and yet the Government estimate is 8,340,000, being 414,000 bales more than theirs. He suggests that if our Government is not more accurate it ought to cease giving out estimates of the production and it ought to confine itself merely to giving a statement of the condition of the crop.

Whether this position should or should not be adopted I do not know; but I desire to say that it does seem to me that with all the aid that this department has if it can not make a guess that is within 25 per cent of the actual size of a crop it certainly ought to stop estimating. It is misleading and confusing, and it is very injurious to the producers of cotton. It has gotten to a point where the public puts no confidence whatever in the department's estimates, and I consider that a very deplorable condition.

I very much regret to see a situation where the people of our country have no respect or confidence in the accuracy of our departments, and it does seem to me that the time has come when this department should be overhauled and reorganized, or certainly looked into very thoroughly. All of these reports come around and they operate against the producer. There has arisen a system of publishing the reports—although the Government is not responsible for that; it is done on the part of the manipulators—in such a way as to combine, for instance, the quantity of linters on hand with the quantity of cotton.

For instance, a short time ago I saw where they had reported in Charleston 190,000 bales of cotton on hand. I was satisfied that that was an error, and I wired Charleston, and they wired me back that they had about 20,000 bales of cotton on hand, and 168,000 bales of linters. Those reports are allowed to go out to the public, and the people believe that there is a great quantity of cotton on hand, whereas that is an error and is misleading.

I can not understand how reputable newspapers will publish statements of that kind. They certainly can get the facts from the Agricultural Department if they would ask, and the department separates linters from actual cotton; but they will persistently do it, and if you will watch in the morning paper you will see where they combine those linters with cotton and count it all as cotton.

My constituent says our people are suffering greatly by reason of these manipulations. I think we ought to take some step to correct the situation.

I might say that but few, if any, people have confidence in the last Government estimate.

ISSUANCE OF CHECKS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to recur to the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia, which is now on the table and which came over from the House with some amendments. I do not know whether the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is willing to allow the House amendments to be adopted or would prefer to have the amendments go to conference.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator be kind enough to wait until the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] come into the Chamber?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are they coming?

Mr. KING. I understand they will be here. If they do not come within a short time, I shall not resist the Senator seeking the floor for the purpose of making such disposition of the amendments as he deems proper.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from Hon. SYDNEY ANDERSON, chairman of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, transmitting, pursuant to Senate concurrent resolution 4, part 1 of the report of the said commission, entitled "The Agricultural Crisis and Its Causes," and stating that the remainder of the report would be issued in three parts, as follows: Part 2, Credit; part 3, Transportation; and part 4, Distribution and Marketing; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the report which the Chair has just laid before the Senate from the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry I will say that this is the first section of the report, the commission having determined to report to Congress in four sections. The report which has just been handed down, known as the first section, is on the subject of the causes of the agricultural crisis. I shall ask for the present merely that the report lie upon the table. I may desire to make a motion with respect to it later on.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Has the report to which he refers been printed?

Mr. LENROOT. It has not been printed, except an advance copy. There will be a resolution in the other House providing for printing the report.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the Senator's request, except that I should like to have the report printed so that Senators may get it.

Mr. LENROOT. It will be printed. A joint resolution of the House will provide for the printing of 50,000 copies.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not the Senator be willing to have printed the report which has now been made? How long is it?

Mr. LENROOT. It comprises 125 pages. I now ask unanimous consent that the summary of part 1 of the report as found in the report be printed in the RECORD. It is about 16 pages in length.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the summary will be printed in the RECORD.

The summary referred to is as follows:

CAUSES OF AGRICULTURAL CRISIS—SUMMARY OF PART 1 OF HOUSE REPORT NO. 408 OF THE JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY RELATIVE TO THE CAUSES OF THE AGRICULTURAL CRISIS.

The commission recommends:

(1) That the Federal Government affirmatively legalize the cooperative combination of farmers for the purpose of marketing, grading, sorting, processing, or distributing their products.

(2) That the farmer's requirements for credit corresponding to his turnover and having maturity of from six months to three years, which will enable payment to be made from the proceeds of the farm, be met by an adaptation of the present banking system of the country, which will enable it to furnish credit of this character. It is expected that a concrete proposal to carry out this recommendation will be made in part 2 of this report.

(3) That there should be a warehousing system which will provide a uniform liability on the part of the warehousemen and in which the moral and financial hazards are fully insured. To this end the commission suggests the extension of the existing Federal warehouse law and the passage by the several States of uniform laws regulating the liability of warehousemen and the services rendered by them.

(4) The commission believes that an immediate reduction of freight rates on farm products is absolutely necessary to a renewal of normal agricultural operations and prosperity and recommends prompt action by the railroads and constituted public authority to that end. (Since this recommendation was agreed to, certain reductions in freight rates upon agricultural products have been made.)

(5) That there should be an extension of the statistical divisions of the Department of Agriculture, particularly along the lines of procurement of live-stock statistics.

(6) That provision should be made by Congress for agricultural attachés in the principal foreign countries producing and consuming agricultural products.

(7) The development by trade associations and by State and Federal sanction of more accurate, uniform, and practical grades of agricultural products and standards of containers for the same.

(8) That adequate Federal appropriations should be made for the promotion of better book and record keeping of the cost of production of farm products on the basis of the farm plant unit, as a basis for the development of more efficient methods of farm management.

(9) Provision for an extended and coordinated program of a practical and scientific investigation through State and National departments of agriculture and through agricultural colleges and universities directed toward reducing the hazards of climate and weather conditions and of plant and animal diseases and insect pests.

(10) More adequate wholesale terminal facilities, particularly for handling perishables at primary markets and a more thorough organization of the agencies and facilities of distribution of the large consuming centers of the country.

(11) The development of better roads to local markets, joint facilities at terminals connecting rail, water, and motor transport systems, and more adequate facilities at shipping points with a view to reducing the cost of marketing and distribution.

(12) That greater effort be directed to the improvement of community life.

(13) The renewal of conditions of confidence and industrial as well as agricultural prosperity is dependent upon a readjustment of prices for commodities to the end that prices received for commodities will represent a fair division of the economic rewards of industry, risk, management, and investment of capital. These conditions can not be brought about by legislative formulas, but must be the result for the most part of the interplay of economic forces. The Government and the States within their respective spheres should do by legislative and administrative action what it may be possible to do, based upon sound principles, to facilitate this readjustment.

In making the foregoing recommendations it must be understood that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government is limited and that it can not directly regulate production, marketing, or transportation, not the subject of interstate commerce. Therefore the foregoing recommendations contemplate, in addition to legislation within the jurisdiction of Congress, action by State authorities within their respective jurisdictions and local and private interests, in order to achieve the objects sought.

Business cycles of alternating great prosperity and succeeding great depression, such as that from which we are now emerging, have occurred in a more or less regular way among all modern highly organized nations. These cycles vary greatly in phenomena, intensity, and duration, and among the countries and localities affected by them, but are substantially similar in their principal characteristics.

Various theories have been advanced as to the causes of these cycles, but the consensus of opinion, we think, supports the view that the primary cause of the arrest of optimism, expansion, speculation, and prosperity, and the beginnings of the phenomena of depression, is the exhaustion of credit and money capital, which is followed by the loss of either foreign or domestic markets or both.

The cycle runs from the end of a period of depression, when confidence begins slowly to return, when surplus stocks of goods have been worked off and shelf stocks are generally reduced; when the lowered demand accompanying unemployment begins to overtake supply, when money is easy, interest rates are down, and prices, especially for raw materials, are low. At this period business begins to revive; more and more people are employed, and more and more goods are consumed. Business expands at an increasing tempo, unemployment disappears, and wages increase. As prices rise, a fever of speculation sets in, and there develops a veritable scramble for goods, stocks, and properties. Paper profits are large. People spend freely, extravagantly, and finally beyond their current income. Orders for present and future deliveries pile up and an apparent shortage of goods develops a seller's market. Industrial plants are extended to meet this supposed demand, interest rates rise, and bank loans and currency issues expand to meet the expansion of business. All the economic and psychological factors conspire to produce an era of intense business activity and prosperity.

In these periods of great activity and prosperity, a heavy volume of debts is made for plant extensions, for production, and consumption. These debts accumulate faster than production and savings. Greater and greater difficulty is encountered in meeting debts and interest currently due with current production and savings. As interest and debts currently due overtake and pass current production and savings, a curious reversal of direction occurs in the economic and psychological forces and phenomena which combine to produce prosperity. Bankers, whose expanding loans have depleted their reserves, are forced to stop further lending and then to call loans; banks of issue raise discount rates; speculation rapidly diminishes; manufacturers and merchants begin to place surplus stocks on the markets; prices begin to fall; consumers curtail purchases and spending in anticipation of still lower prices; orders for goods are canceled, and it becomes apparent that the orders representing demand were more or less of fictitious proportions; more and more goods are put on the market, while demand grows less and less; building slows down; debts are liquidated as far as possible from current receipts; the buyers' strike develops; production falls off in consequence of lowered demand; and unemployment develops; prices continue to fall, and the decline is usually more rapid than the rise.

This process is continued until some portion of the debts made in the period of prosperity is liquidated and until stocks are reduced to a point where such demand as exists, even in times of unemployment, finally overtakes supply. Prices and interest rates are down, wages are lower, money is easy, and the beginning of the new era of prosperity is at hand; all of which we have seen in this country and in many others in a highly condensed and most spectacular form in the last two and a half years. Rarely has a cycle swept through all its familiar features more swiftly and dramatically than that which followed the close of the Great War. The most distant nations were equally involved, and most of them followed through the successive phases in almost identical times. Far-distant Java and Japan were affected in much the same way, at much the same times, as the United States, Canada, and Great Britain.

In the United States every industry and every class of people were involved in the avalanche of descending prices. The turn in the tide from optimism, expansion, speculation, and extravagance to the reaction of deflation and depression occurred about the middle of 1920 and at about the time when the grain crop of the United States was beginning to go on the market. The prices of live stock and live-stock products had already begun to decline, and these facts together, coupled with a failing export demand, were undoubtedly responsible for earlier and more rapid decline in the prices of agricultural products compared with the prices of other groups of commodities.

It is to the determination of the present condition of agriculture as a result of the influences, psychological and economic, which brought about the crisis of 1920 and 1921 and the causes of these conditions that this part of the report is devoted.

In arriving at an understanding of the condition of the farmer resulting from the debacle of prices in 1920 and 1921 and in the economic periods which preceded it, the commission has undertaken to measure the well-being of the farmer by four standards. These standards were:

1. The purchasing power of the farmer's dollar.
2. The absolute prices of farm products as compared with the absolute prices of other groups of commodities.
3. The quantity production of agriculture as compared with the quantity production of other industries.
4. The income or reward for capital invested and labor employed in the agricultural industry as compared with the income or reward for capital invested or labor employed in other industries.

THE FARMER'S DOLLAR.

Measured in terms of purchasing power, the farmer's dollar in 1920 was worth 89 cents. In May, 1921, it was worth 77 cents. During the past 12 months it has been worth less than in any preceding 12 months in 30 years.

The prices of farm products during the war period were higher than the prices of some groups of commodities and lower than others. On the whole, they about kept pace with the prices of all commodities combined. In the recent perpendicular decline the prices of farm products declined more rapidly and went to a lower level than the prices of other commodities. This fact increased the disadvantage of the farmer during the period of deflation by increasing the margin between the prices of what he had to sell and the prices of the commodities he had to buy. Inflation has the effect of taking money from some groups and giving it to others. Deflation does the same, but deflation does not necessarily take money from those who profited by inflation. In the rise and fall of commodity prices during the cycle through which we have just passed the farmers profited but little in a few years and lost heavily in recent months. The profits made by the farmer during the war were only slightly greater than those of 1913 and were swept away by the decline in prices of 1920 and 1921.

THE RELATIVE GROWTH OF AGRICULTURE AND OTHER INDUSTRIES IN QUANTITY PRODUCTION.

The quantity production of agriculture as an industry has not kept pace with quantity production in other industries. It has just about kept pace with population. From 1899 to 1909 the quantity output of agricultural products in the United States increased 10 per cent while the population increased 21.5 per cent. From 1909 to 1919 the quantity output of farms increased 10.5 per cent while population increased 14.5 per cent. This increase in farm output was largely due to an increase in acreage and to a slight degree only to an increase in output per acre. Quantity output of other industries, such as mining and manufacturing, increased more rapidly than did population and has also increased more rapidly than the quantity output of agriculture. Measured by quantity output the well-being of agriculture has lagged behind other industries.

WAGES AND INCOMES.

Agriculture has produced from 16 per cent to 23 per cent of the national income of the United States and normally about 17 per cent or 18 per cent, although approximately 30 per cent of the persons gainfully employed in the United States are engaged in agriculture. The average income received by a farmer for his labor, after deducting the return of 5 per cent on his property investment, is below the average earnings of employees in many other industries. The average reward per farmer for labor, risk, and management, after allowing 5 per cent return on the value of his investment, in 1909 was $311. In 1918 it was $1,278, and in 1920 it was $465. Measured in terms of purchasing power, the farmer's reward in 1909 was $326; in 1918, it was $826; and in 1920, $219. The average reward of employees in the mining industry in 1909 was $590; in 1918 it was $1,280. Measured in purchasing power, it was $618 in 1909 and $808 in 1918. The average yearly earnings of employees in railway transportation in 1909 was $773, and in 1918, $1,532. Measured in terms of purchasing power, the earnings of employees in rail transportation was $682 in 1909 and $882 in 1918. If a farmer in 1918 had been employed in the mining industry, he would have received a wage of $1,280, or about what he received for labor, risk, and management on the farm. Had he worked as an employee of a railway or of a bank and obtained the average wages of an employee in either industry, he would have received more for his labor than he received for risk, management, and labor in 1918 on the farm.

While the income and reward for capital invested and labor employed in agriculture have been improving in recent years, as compared with other industries, they are still relatively lower and in 1920 were far below the rewards of other industries.

Measured by the standard of purchasing power of his products, by the absolute prices of farm products as compared with the prices of other commodities, by the test of quantity output or the test of income and rewards for capital invested and labor employed, agriculture in 1920 and thus far in 1921 is relatively worse off than other industries.

PRODUCTION IN 1920.

In summating the causes which brought about the debacle of prices in 1920 and 1921 it is necessary to marshal them in such a way that their relation to the crisis may be fully understood and their influences properly assessed. These factors are normally the factors which go to make prices of farm products which in their relation to the prices of other groups of commodities are in a sense a measure of the relative well-being of agriculture as compared with other industries. These factors are total production, including imports, per capita production, total consumption including exports and per capita consumption.

Was the decline of agricultural prices in the crop year 1920–21 induced by overproduction in 1920? The total production of grain in 1920 was greater than in any other year since 1915 but less than in 1915, 1912, or 1906. In none of these years did a production greater than that of 1920 produce anything like the same decline in prices. The production of wheat and corn in 1920 was somewhat larger than the average for 1909–1913, while the production of cotton was relatively less.

The number of beef cattle and sheep on farms in 1920 was less than on the average for the period of 1909–1913, while the number of hog farms was somewhat greater. The slaughter of cattle and sheep in 1920 was markedly below the average slaughter in the years 1909–1913, while the slaughter of hogs was slightly greater than the years 1909–1913 and the slaughter of calves markedly so. On the whole, however, it can not be said that overproduction or overmarketing of farm products in 1920 was in any considerable measure a moving factor in the decline of prices, 1920–21.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS OF FARM PRODUCTS.

If the decline in prices of agricultural products can not be attributed to overproduction, can it be attributed to a decline of consumption as reflected in a falling off of exports of farm products?

In assessing the importance of exports as a factor in determining the price of the domestic product, it must be remembered that agricultural products for the most part are produced in surplus quantities and that a relatively inconsiderable increase or decrease in exports has more than a correspondingly great influence upon the prices. The great economist, Gregory King, has estimated that a deficiency of one-tenth will increase the price three-tenths and that a deficiency of two-tenths will increase the price eight-tenths. The same law applies to surpluses. Excess production, therefore, unless absorbed by exports, tends to depress the price in much the same ratio. With the exhaustion of the credits extended by the United States Government to European Governments during the war, of which there was a balance of $2,500,000,000 at the close of the war, the purchasing power of European peoples began to decline. This failing purchasing power was immediately felt in a decline of exports from this country. Production of wheat in 1920, as has been seen, was slightly above the average. Exports of wheat and wheat flour in the fiscal year 1920–21 was greatly in excess of the average and larger than either of the fiscal years 1918–19 or 1919–20, and the decline of the price of wheat was relatively less than the decline in the price of any other grain except rye, production of which in 1920 was largely above the average as were exports. Production of corn in 1920 was also above the average, while exports of corn and corn meal for the fiscal year 1920–21 were also above the average. The price of corn for the crop of the year 1920, however, declined more than the price of either wheat or rye. The production of oats in 1920 was likewise above the average. While exports of oats were above the average 1909–1913 they were far below the average of the preceding five years.

On the whole exports of all grains in the fiscal year 1920–21 were greatly in excess of the 1909–1913 average and about equal to the average of the preceding five years. Excepting wheat and rye, exports of other farm grains are normally not a large factor in determining prices; exports of grain other than wheat and rye are normally almost an insignificant part of the total production. Exports of cotton were markedly less in 1920 than the average. The decline in exports of cotton began in March, 1919, and was promptly reflected in a decline in prices. Approximately two-thirds of the cotton crop is exported, although exports of cotton in recent years have shown a marked tendency to decrease. Consumption of cotton in 1920 was lower than in any year since 1915, and this failure of consumption, coupled with the lack of export demand, was undoubtedly a major factor in producing the tremendous decline in the prices which occurred in this commodity.

Exports of beef and veal declined rapidly during 1920 and 1921. This decline in exports was coincident with the decline in prices and doubtless was a major factor in inducing it. The failure of export demand was accompanied by a sharp decline in prices. Consumption of beef in this country bears a very close relation to urban employment or unemployment, and with the progress of the period of business depression and consequent unemployment, consumption of beef and beef products diminished.

The exports of pork began to fall off as early as May, 1919, and declined rapidly thereafter. Domestic consumption of pork, which is essentially a poor man's food, was relatively maintained during 1920. The first influence, therefore, which induced the decline in prices of pork and pork products must be assigned to the diminishing export demand. The decline in the prices of dairy products was preceded by both a failure of exports and an increase of imports. On the whole, it may be said that the first downward impulse was given prices of live stock, live-stock products, and cotton by diminishing export demand, and that while large exports of wheat and rye served to maintain the level of prices of these commodities above those of other agricultural products they did not serve to wholly prevent decline of prices of these commodities. Consumption of wheat, beef, mutton, and dairy products have all declined during the period of depression and this decline in consumption undoubtedly contributed to and accelerated the decline in the prices of these commodities.

THE BREAK IN PRICES.

The crisis was not confined to this country. The avalanche of declining prices and its attending hardships, sacrifices, and losses involved the whole world. It began in distant Japan with the break in the silk market and the Chinese boycott of Japanese goods. It traveled the circle of the Far East, Australia, India, Java, England, France, Italy, the whole of Europe, South America, Canada, and the United States. It embraced all countries and all industries, though not to the same extent or in the same way.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

In the United States the decline of prices began with live stock and ran the course of farm products. Prices of clothing, metals, and metal products, lumber, shoes, steel, fuel, house-furnishing goods, copper, gasoline, and commodities of all descriptions followed in the train of the prices of agricultural products, but the prices of these commodities did not decline to the same degree or at the same time or with the same rapidity as the prices of agricultural products. Some of them declined only very slightly as compared with agricultural products. All of this served to diminish the purchasing power of farm products during the period and to intensify the farmers' difficulties. As the failing purchasing power of the world began to make itself felt in the lessening of export demand for farm products, the prices of agricultural products began to decline. As prices of agricultural products declined, the purchasing power of the agricultural population, representing nearly 40 per cent of the total purchasing power of the country, began to diminish. As the purchasing power of the American farmer diminished, the production of industries that produced the commodities of commerce began to decline, and unemployment, resulting in diminishing consumption, gave further impulse to the avalanche of prices. Influential and important as these economic forces are in their effect upon prices of commodities, the psychology and attitude of 100,000,000 people, once directed either by optimism and the influences of expansion or by pessimism and the influences of depression, must not be overlooked.

PER CAPITA PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

A constructive and general program of permanent agricultural development can not be predicated upon the abnormal phenomena of a period of expansion or depression. It must proceed from a consideration of the course of agriculture over a long period of development in order that the wisdom of experience and a consideration of the organized knowledge of agriculture may be the guide and director of future development. It is therefore necessary to marshal the facts of production and consumption in such a way that the relation of the various factors which influence prices and therefore, in a degree at least, determine the welfare of agriculture may be thoroughly considered and the course of agricultural development properly appraised. A summation of these factors on the basis solely of total production would lead to wholly erroneous conclusions. The development of agriculture must be measured in terms of increase of population—that is, in terms of production per inhabitant. The total production of wheat shows marked fluctuations from year to year, but on the whole has about kept pace with the increase in population.

The consumption of wheat, while varying widely and showing a great tendency to decline in periods of industrial depression and unemployment, has, nevertheless, on the whole, shown a tendency to increase. While there is at times an apparent relation between consumption as expressed by domestic consumption and exports and the price of wheat and wheat flour, the relationship is extremely irregular and apparently modified greatly by the method of selling wheat on the exchanges of the country, which introduces among the price-determining factors rumors of every sort, including the weather, crop failures, industrial and economic conditions of more or less temporary and indefinite character. The domestic consumption of wheat in 1920, as compared with 1919, dropped from 6.9 bushels to 4.6 bushels. This decline in consumption was no doubt due to failing purchasing power resulting from unemployment and the general depression which came upon the country during the last half of 1920.

Production of corn has about kept pace with population, and consumption has been about equal to production from year to year. The relation of prices to per capita production has been an irregular one, but on the whole a large per capita production of corn has resulted in a decreasing price and a small production in an increase of price. Corn can be carried over from year to year, and the carry over has had the effect of somewhat stabilizing the price of corn from year to year.

Production of cotton in the United States in recent years has shown a tendency to decline. Exports which constitute normally from one-half to two-thirds of the crop has likewise declined in recent years. There appears to be a close relation between production and consumption of cotton, including export demand and prices. In general, large crops have resulted in declining prices and small crops in increased prices. It seems probable that statistics of crop conditions and of crop production, which for cotton are probably more accurate than for any other farm product, have had an influence in establishing a closer relation between the factors of production and consumption and the price in the case of cotton than in any other farm product.

The total number of milch cows on farms has increased in recent years, but the number of milch cows per 1,000 of population has decreased. The increase in total number has not been sufficient to maintain the per capita ratio of milch cows to population. The value of milch cows has increased steadily since 1890 and apparently without regular relation to the increase or decrease in the number of head per 1,000 of population, although on the whole the decline in the ratio of milch cattle to population has apparently tended to support a slight increase of milch cows in recent years. There has been a marked revolution in the dairy industry in recent years. The production of butter and cheese has markedly declined since 1899, while the production of milk and the number of gallons of milk sold has increased. In other words, the increasing quantity of milk required by increasing urban populations has been obtained at the cost of decreased production of butter and cheese.

The number of cattle other than milch cows on farms during the last decade was less than in the preceding decade. The number of cattle on farms per thousand of population has decreased in the last decade at a rapid rate. The price of cattle has borne a rather close relation to the increase or decrease of the number of cattle per thousand of population. Seven years of large production of cattle per capita were accompanied by seven years of low prices. Three years of low production, beginning in 1897, resulted in three years of high prices. Eleven years of large production resulted in 11 years of low prices, while 10 years of low production brought 10 years of relatively high prices.

On the whole consumption of meat in the United States is declining, and it may be inferred that consumption of meat in this country is following the trend of consumption of meat in Europe—that is to say, that with declining herds and increasing cost of production, the prices of meat seem likely to continue to increase, with resulting decreases in consumption. This decrease in consumption of meats is probably a factor in the increasing consumption of wheat and bread grains. In other words, we are gradually changing from a meat-eating nation to a bread-eating nation. Consumption of veal in this country has rapidly increased in recent years, and if continued at the same or an increasing rate is certain to result in a decrease in the supply of beef in the future.

The tendency toward increased slaughter of calves and consumption of veal is a real menace to the future production of beef in the country, and presages an increase in the price of beef in the relatively immediate future.

The actual number of sheep on farms in the decade ending 1920 was lower than in the decade ending 1910. The average number of sheep per thousand of population in the last decade was below the average of either of the two preceding decades. The marked decline in the price of sheep which occurred in 1920 and 1921 seems likely to increase the rate at which flocks of sheep in this country are diminished. Unless some way can be found to introduce sheep and wool production in the scheme of husbandry of small farms, the diminishing acreage for pasture in the mountain States, coupled with the increases in the cost of production, seem likely to further diminish the total number of sheep on the farms.

On the whole, agricultural production in the United States has barely kept pace with consumption. Production of wheat and grains have about kept pace with increase in population, while production of cattle other than beef cattle and sheep has not kept pace with increase in population. The prices received for farm products have not been such as to induce an increase in farm production on the whole. While prices of agricultural products have borne a more or less irregular relation to the factors of supply and demand, these relationships are not as close as they should be or would be if more accurate agricultural statistics of production and supply could be made available.

COSTS OF PRODUCTION.

The costs of production for the 1920 crop were greater than the costs of any preceding crop in the history of the country. During 1919 and the first half of 1920 costs of production of agricultural products rose more rapidly than prices of agricultural products and since June, 1920, costs of production have declined less rapidly than prices of agricultural products.

Considerable data upon costs of production of farm products have been gathered by the United States Department of Agriculture and State departments of agriculture, but this data is not sufficiently comprehensive nor accurate nor does it cover a sufficiently long period of time to constitute a safe basis for definite conclusions with respect to the profit or lack of profit in farming operations in recent years. In general, however, it can be safely assumed that the crop of 1920 was sold at less than the cost of production. Changes in farming methods, as well as the lack of skilled help and the development of farm machinery, have introduced a number of new elements into the cost of production and at the same time investment in land, buildings, and equipment has very materially increased. The quantity of fertilizers used in the production of farm crops, as well as the total expenditure for farm fertilizer, has more than doubled in the last 10 years.

Wages of employees in agriculture, while relatively lower than in any other industries, have increased in later years. This is due to the necessity of meeting industrial competition and the more skilled character of the labor which must now be employed in farming operations.

FARM MORTGAGES.

In the last 10 years the total number of mortgages on farm lands and buildings owned by their operators has more than doubled and has increased proportionately more than the value of lands and buildings. The increase in the amount of farm mortgages is greatly in excess of the increase in quantity production of farm products, and it would seem that the payment of the added interest and principal of the farm debt can only be paid out of increased prices. It is difficult to see how it can be paid out of prices such as have existed during the past 12 months. The decline in prices of agricultural products in the last 12 months has been equivalent to 53 per cent of the prices at the peak. This decline in the price of agricultural products has the effect of again doubling the farmers' debt, already doubled as compared with 1910.

TENANCY.

Tenancy in the United States has increased but slightly in the last decade, principally in the States west of the Mississippi River and south of the Mason and Dixon line. It is impossible to accurately predict the effect of the recent avalanche of descending prices upon tenancy in this country, but it is probable that tenancy will increase rather than diminish.

TRANSPORTATION.

The pyramided advances in freight rates which have been made since 1913 have resulted in the highest level of freight rates during the period when agricultural products were at the lowest point they have been for 30 years in terms of purchasing power. These increases have had the effect of diminishing the net price received by the farmer, as the price of farm products is usually the price at the terminal or the price at the place where the product of one locality or one country comes in direct competition with the product of another locality or another country, less the freight from the local market to that terminal.

Railroad service, like any other service or commodity, must be sold at a price within the reach of the people who pay for it. Freight rates, therefore, must bear some relation to the prices which it is possible to obtain for the commodities transported.

Numerous instances were brought to the attention of the commission in which it was shown that the total receipts from shipments, especially of fruits and vegetables, were absorbed by railroad charges in transporting them to market, leaving the producer nothing for his time, labor, and investment in producing them.

In other cases commodities could not be moved at all because the price at the terminal would be entirely absorbed by the freight charges in transporting them.

No industry can survive or prosper under such conditions.

An immediate reduction in freight rates from the farmer's standpoint, both as a producer and consumer, is absolutely essential to anything approximating a normal return of profits for farming operations. The commission believes that an immediate reduction of freight rates on farm products is absolutely necessary to a renewal of normal agricultural operations and prosperity, and recommends prompt action by the railroads and the constituted public authority controlling transportation rates looking to a scientific readjustment downward of existing tariffs on agricultural products. (Since this recommendation was agreed to, certain reductions in freight rates upon agricultural products have been made.)

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES.

During the period of price decline the wholesale prices of other commodities lagged behind the prices of farm products, and retail prices lagged far behind wholesale prices. Wholesale and retail prices of other commodities did not come down as fast as prices of farm products. This had the effect of widening the margin between the price which the farmer received for the products he had to sell and the prices which he paid for the products he had to buy. In general, retail margins have shown a tendency to decline as wholesale prices rose and to increase as wholesale prices declined. Retail margins in the first half of 1921 when farm products were at the lowest level were very much above retail margins in 1913.

The commission is now engaged in gathering data from which it expects to make an exhaustive analysis of the processes of distribution and the relation of prices of farm products, wholesale prices and retail prices. The conclusions and recommendations which it is expected will result from this investigation are reserved for another part of this report.

ACREAGE AND VALUE OF FARM LANDS.

At the close of the War between the States the unappropriated public domain consisted of 1,470,098,812 acres. In the 50 years since 1870 this acreage has been reduced by settlement 554,330,545 acres, and there remains of the public domain, including Alaska, unappropriated 542,511,252 acres.

There is no classification from which an estimate can be made of the proportion of these lands which is suitable for agricultural development, but it is safe to say, in general, that the remaining public lands are probably suitable for grazing and forestry except in those localities where land may be reclaimed by either irrigation or drainage.

From 1870 to 1920 the total value of land in farms and on farm buildings increased from $7,444,054,462 to $66,316,002,602. The value of land in farms in 1920 was $54,829,563,059 and the value of buildings on farms, $11,486,439,543. In the period from 1870 to 1920, the value per farm of land and buildings increased from $2,799 to $10,284. The total sum invested in farm equipment and machinery increased in the same period from $270,913,678 to $3,594,772,928. The total value of live stock on farms in the same period increased from $1,229,889,609 to $8,013,324,808. The rural population—that is, the population outside of incorporated places having 2,500 or over—decreased from 71.4 per cent to 48.6 per cent. The per acre production of grains has increased at the rate of about one-half of 1 per cent per acre per annum in the last 30 years.

NEED OF AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM.

It is clear that there is an imperative necessity for the formulation of a definite program looking to the permanent development of agriculture with a view of relating agriculture with the various agencies of distribution in such a way as to avoid duplication, waste, and loss in the common purpose to deliver the products of the farm to the consumer in the most economical and efficient way. The first essential of such a program is a conscious appreciation not only on the part of the farmer but also on the part of the country as well, that such a program is necessary. The second essential involves the proper organization of the knowledge of agriculture with particular reference to the marketing and distribution of agricultural products and the establishment of a sound, accurate, and current basis of agricultural statistics. This is suggested without reflection or criticism upon the statistical divisions of the Department of Agriculture. The agricultural statistics of this country are better than those of any other country in the world. They can and ought to be better than they are.

STATISTICS OF AGRICULTURE.

The statistics now available are neither sufficiently accurate, comprehensive, nor current, nor are they established upon a sufficiently definite and uniform basis to be completely comparable from year to year over a long period. There is not sufficient coordination of agricultural statistics with statistics of production and consumption, exports and imports procured by other departments. There should be an expansion of the statistical divisions of the Department of Agriculture, particularly along lines of procurement of live-stock statistics. Sound, accurate, current statistics are essential, not only to a conscious program of agricultural development but to the correlation of agriculture with the agencies of manufacture and distribution.

Agricultural statistics should include not only statistics of production and consumption, exports and imports from and to this country, but similar data with reference to crops in foreign countries. The commission is of the opinion that the United States should be represented by agricultural attachés in the principal countries producing agricultural products and consuming them. Foreign agricultural statistics, both of production and consumption, are seldom available from foreign Government sources in time to be of value to the farmers or dealers in grain in this country. It is desirable that agencies should be set up in the principal centers of foreign production and consumption of farm products in order that those interested in the United States can be currently advised as to world crop production and consumption conditions.

STANDARDS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS AND CONTAINERS.

One of the elements which is now lacking in considerable measure, at least in the procurement of agricultural statistics, is a basis of standardization of agricultural products and containers. Standardization of agricultural products and containers is likewise essential to any adequate scheme of marketing and distributing farm products if unnecessary waste and losses in the process of marketing and distribution are to be avoided. The process of distribution will be greatly facilitated by sound and practical standards and grades applied to agricultural products in commerce. Standardization will likewise increase the opportunity of the consumer to secure the exact thing for which he bargains and to measure the quality of the product which he buys.

NEED OF ORGANIZATION AND COOPERATION IN PRODUCTIVE MARKETING AND DISTRIBUTION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

In recent years there has been a marked development of farm organizations upon cooperative lines for the purpose of selling, sorting, grading, marketing, and processing farm products. Losses to the farmer incident to his failure to properly sort, grade, and bulk his product are by no means inconsiderable. Individual farmers, however, can not economically purchase and operate the necessary machinery and maintain the necessary agencies for this purpose. It must be done cooperatively, if the farmer is to do it, or the farmer must turn this phase of the function of marketing over to some one else, in which case the profits incident to the better sorting, grading, and packing of the product go to the sorter, grader, or packer instead of to the farmer. The appropriate place and the proper functions of farmers' cooperative organizations will be fully discussed in connection with the report on distribution of farm products to be issued later, but the investigation of the commission has proceeded far enough to justify it in recommending legislation by Congress affirmatively recognizing the right of the farmer to combine with other farmers for the purpose of selling, sorting, grading, marketing, and processing his product.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT.

The need of adapting the banking machinery of the country to the farmer's turnover and business requirements will be discussed in part 2 of this report and recommendations to accomplish this result will be therein made. It is sufficient to say here that the creation of adequate banking machinery fully adapted to the farmer's requirements is an integral part of a comprehensive program of agricultural development.

WAREHOUSE SYSTEM.

The warehouse system of the United States is a decentralized and disintegrated system, subject to the widest variations of regulation of the warehouseman's liability in the different States. This situation does not lend itself to systematic marketing or orderly financing of farmers' crops. There should be a national warehouse system which would provide uniform liability on the part of the warehouseman and in which the moral and financial hazards are fully insured. To this end the commission recommends the extension of the existing Federal warehouse law and the passage by the several States of uniform laws regulating the liability of warehousemen and the services rendered by them. The farmer can not hope to adequately control the marketing of his product or to have influence in proportion to his number and importance in the absence of a warehouse system which will enable him to hold or sell his crops as his own judgment, or the judgment of the cooperative association of which he may be a member, dictates.

READJUSTMENT OF PRICES.

The orderly development of production, marketing, and distribution of farm products must be predicated upon the establishment of price levels representing a fair degree of equality of purchasing power between agricultural products and other commodities and economic rewards for investment and labor in agriculture equivalent to the property and labor returns in other industries.

It is perfectly obvious that agriculture can not prosper on the basis of a price level for its products substantially below the price level of other commodities. The exodus from the farm to the city has been attributed in the most part to the social advantages which the city is supposed to offer over the country. A careful investigation of the economic condition of the farmer leads to the conclusion that this exodus has been in a larger measure due to the greater economic rewards offered by urban employment than is offered for the risk, management, and labor on the farm and the greater income for capital invested in industry as compared with the income of capital invested in agriculture.

AGRICULTURAL SCIENCE AND EDUCATION.

Agriculture is subject to exceptional hazards resulting from the weather and climatic conditions, animal and plant diseases, and insect pests. These hazards reduce farming to a gigantic gamble. But methods of production can be adapted to the end of reducing losses from climatic and weather conditions to the minimum. Plant and animal diseases and insect pests can, to a certain degree, be controlled. But the means and the method of reducing or controlling these hazards can not be worked out on the farm by the individual farmer. The investment even of the largest is not sufficient to permit the maintenance of the organization necessary for the study and formulation of these means and methods. A program of agricultural development therefore must include provisions for an expanded and coordinated program of practical scientific investigation through State and National departments of agriculture, and through agricultural colleges and universities directed toward reducing the hazards of climatic and weather conditions and of plant and animal diseases and insect pests. It should include the extension of instruction in the sciences and economics of agriculture in the public schools.

COST ACCOUNTING.

Considerable progress has been made in recent years in promoting better book and record keeping of the costs of production of farm products on individual farms. Better bookkeeping methods, including more adequate and complete cost records by farmers, are essential to the development of more efficient farm management methods. The efforts of farmers in this direction should be promoted by State and Federal departments of agriculture and supported by adequate Federal appropriations.

WHOLESALE TERMINAL FACILITIES.

Wholesale terminal facilities in most of the cities of the United States are archaic and ill adapted to efficiently and economically distribute farm commodities, particularly perishables. Better wholesale terminal facilities of primary markets and a more thorough knowledge of organization of distribution agencies and facilities in large cities is essential to carrying out any constructive agricultural program.

GREATER SOCIAL AND COMMUNITY SATISFACTION.

Good roads to local markets, joint facilities at terminals connecting rail, water, and motor transport systems and more adequate facilities at shipping points will materially contribute to a reduction in the costs of marketing and distribution to the mutual benefit of producer and consumer.

While it is considered that greater economic rewards will constitute the greatest incentive to maintaining agricultural production and particularly keeping on the farm the people already there and their children, a program of agricultural development should be directed toward greater social and community satisfactions, and more convenient and improved social and community institutions.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does the matter which the Senator has sent to the desk have anything to do with continuing the life of the commission?

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is a summary of the first section of the report of the commission that is now before us. I shall later bring up the matter of continuing the life of the commission.

Mr. SMITH. The matter to which the Senator referred is the first section of the report?

Mr. LENROOT. It is the first section of the report.

Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution No. 38, extending the time within which the commission may make its investigation and report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 38) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for the completion of the investigation by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, created by a Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and the filing of the report to Congress therein directed to be made, be, and the same is hereby, extended to a date not later than the 15th of April, 1922.

Mr. LENROOT. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

TRADE WITH CHINA.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senate for its information that immediately after the bill relative to the financial affairs of the District of Columbia shall have been disposed of, it is my purpose to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of what is generally known as the China trade act.

I wish, further, to say that the hearings upon this subject, which are very illuminating and extensive, have been laid upon the desk of each Senator this morning, so that by the time we reach the subject every Senator may be well advised upon the matter.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS OF SHIPPING BOARD (S. DOC. NO. 103).

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a few days ago the Shipping Board, so I am informed, transmitted to the Senate the information called for by Senate resolution 155. I think the communication from the Shipping Board was referred to the Committee on Commerce. If there is no objection, I should like to have it printed, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

KOREAN MISSION TO CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

Mr. KING. I have here a statement addressed to the Conference on Limitation of Armament by the Korean Mission, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

KOREAN MISSION TO THE CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT, CONTINENTAL TRUST BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., December 1, 1921.

"All of us demand liberty and justice. There can not be one without the other, and they must be held the unquestionable possession of all peoples. Inherent rights are of God, and the tragedies of the world originate in their attempted denial. The world to-day is infringing their enjoyment by arming to defend or deny, when simple sanity calls for their recognition through common understanding." (President Harding in opening address to the conference.)

TO THE CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT:

Prior to your assemblage and organization we presented to the delegation from the United States an appeal on behalf of the Korean people for an opportunity to present their plea to its consideration, in the hope that we might, through its good offices, be granted the opportunity to obtain a hearing before the conference. A copy of that appeal is hereto attached. (Appendix No. 1.)

All of the conferee nations, with one exception, are in a similar situation to the United States, for they have agreed by treaty with Korea to use their good offices in case of her oppression—per consequence—we have resolved to also present Korea's appeal for justice to the conference as a whole.

Assuredly we can assume that all of the ambassadors, delegates, and advisers who participate in the grave responsibilities of your task are familiar with those treaties and with the interpretative diplomatic correspondence relating to them. However, for convenience of reference we have prepared an abstract of the governmental records, documents, and treaties pertaining to the relations of each conferee nation with Korea, which is attached as Appendix No. 2 under the title, "What the conferee nations have said and pledged."

We solemnly affirm that justice to Korea constitutes an indispensable requisite to the permanent adjustment of far eastern affairs. How can there be peace in the Orient if a nation of 20,000,000 people are left to smart with the injustice of treaties "unkept"?

When Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and Empress of India, through Her Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary Sir Harry Smith Parkes, Knight of the Grand Cross and Knight Commander of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath, said in the treaty of 1883, that there shall be perpetual peace and friendship with Korea, and that in case of difference with a third power Great Britain would step in to exert its good offices to bring about an amicable arrangement Korea saw back of those covenants the integrity of England.

When His Majesty the King of Belgium, through Monsieur Leon Vincart, Chevalier of the Order of Leopold of Belgium, said in the treaty of 1901 that the good offices of Belgium would be extended to Korea in case of need, Korea knew that the honor of Belgium had been pledged.

When His Majesty the King of Italy, through Chevalier Ferdinand de Luca, Knight Commander of the Mauritian Order and of the Order of the Crown of Italy, decorated by China with the Order of the Two Dragons, said in the treaty of 1884 that the good offices of Italy would be available to Korea in case of differences with a third power, she knew that she could rely upon the pledges of Italy.

The pledges of Denmark were hers through the treaty of 1902, when His Majesty the King of Denmark, through Monsieur A. Pavlow, Commander of the Order of St. Anne, signed the treaty with Korea.

What confidence must have been Korea's when she read the proclamation of the President of the United States that "every clause and article" of the treaty of 1882 "must be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof."

Can you say to Korea that these pledges are meaningless? That she can be annexed by her own ally whom she assisted to win a great war? That against the will of her people she can be stripped of all sovereignty, freedom, and liberty? That her people can be taxed without representation, oppressed and annihilated, without even a protest? If you say that; if that is your position—can you expect to have world peace result from such a conference? Will any agreement that you make here have any more binding force or effect than the agreements that you have already made, and will the world at large or even yourselves have any respect for them?

The United States should assist China, as she is doing. She is hearing China's cry for justice because in 1858 the United States pledged to China her good offices in the treaty then proclaimed by President Buchanan (U. S. Stat. at Large, vol. XII, p. 1023). For the same reason she should assist Korea, because in 1882 the United States pledged to Korea her good offices in the treaty then proclaimed by President Arthur (U. S. Stat. at Large, vol. XXIII, p. 720).

An American writer of the highest repute has recently declared that—

"In the list of commitments our pledged support to China and our guarantee of her territorial and administrative integrity, now greatly menaced, will bulk large. Our pledge to support China goes back to the treaty of 1858, in which we pledged ourselves to use our good offices in case any nation acted unjustly toward China. To-day that pledge is China's main hope of salvation from the many dangers by which she is threatened. Should we be blind to our own interests? The appeal to our national honor will not be made in vain nor go unheeded."

Korea, yielding to the persuasion of America, emerged from the solitude of her hermit life and timidly joined the family of nations. She differs from China to-day only in that the processes of foreign intrusion have fully accomplished in Korea what are still in progress in China. Confronted with their menace Korea vainly invoked the covenant for her protection. Her "appeal to the national honor" was made in vain, for it went unheeded.

If the observance of this pledge be now essential to the preservation of China, it is the more essential for the restoration of Korea, which presents in concrete form the fruitage of every policy which threatens China's economic or political integrity. The processes involving China are those which submerged Korea. They are identical in origin, in purpose, and in result. They can not be thwarted in China if they are to be disregarded in Korea.

Because China still retains the external forms of government she is rightly given a place at your council board. Because Korea has been deprived of all forms of government is she to be denied even a hearing before a tribunal which "is an earnest of the awakened conscience of twentieth century civilization," the call for which "is the spoken word of a war-wearied world struggling for restoration, hungering and thirsting for better relationship of humanity, crying for relief and craving assurances of everlasting peace"?

We venture the assertion that our appeal for your consideration can be denied only from motives of expediency. But this conference, rich with the sad experiences of its many predecessors, should provide no place for an expediency which excludes the seat of justice. Expedients are palliatives which postpone but never correct; always convenient, sometimes necessary, seldom conclusive. They are the bane of treaties, the most fruitful, if not the only cause of their miscarriage.

If it be argued that the absorption of Korea by the Empire of Japan be a fait accompli, and therefore beyond your consideration, we may reply by the assertion that no such act is ever final when the result is oppression or breach of treaty covenants. History supplies us with many illustrations of this inexorable truth, of which Poland, Greece, Finland, Bohemia, and others are exemplars. The conscience of the world sustains the cause of such people, and its peace is imperiled until justice hears and responds to their appeals.

Korea is the most ancient of nations. Until compelled by the force majeur of the United States she was wholly self-contained. She was the hermit nation. She was content with her own affairs. She envied her neighbors neither their commerce nor their domains. She sought no conquests. She committed no aggressions.

From 1882 to 1907 she maintained diplomatic relations with all nations under treaties which, without exception, covenanted for the exercise of their good offices should any nation deal unjustly with her. She relied upon these covenants for her security, since her geographic position exposed her to the perils of conflict between her more powerful neighbors.

Her domain commands the entrance to the Yellow Sea, whose hinterland teems with vast populations eager for the trade of the world. It constitutes a tempting, if not essential basis, for extensive schemes of Asiatic conquest, whether military or commercial.

Korea's twenty millions of people are united in their protest against the domination of Japan. That protest has crystallized into the formation of a Republic. Their resistance to the dominant authority is necessarily passive, yet constant and persistent. They are without arms and without money, yet not without organization. Their faith is in the wisdom, the discernment, and the sense of justice of this great conference. They ask to be heard. They are prepared to accept your decree upon the hearing with all the facts before you. The future peace of the world is in your hands, but it will not be attained until the cry of Korea for justice has been answered.

If it be contended that to grant our appeal would be to intrude a domestic or internal affair of Japan into an international discussion, we answer that the more serious problems affecting China are subject to the same criticism. Yet China participates in the deliberations of the conference, and it is universally recognized that the adjustment of her affairs is the sine qua non of any effectual scheme for reducing armaments. And China's principal right to consideration rests upon treaty covenants identical with our own.

It is because the nations with whom we covenanted disregarded our appeals for the exercise of their good offices in our behalf when Korea was unjustly dealt with that we are compelled to present this petition. Had the least of them responded, the eyes of the world would have been turned upon Japan, whose gaze would have stayed her hand. Surely, you will not turn away from us, when you consider how indispensable is your favor to our national rehabilitation and to the accomplishment of your great objective.

Japan can not defend nor mitigate her forcible dominion over Korea upon the plea of needed territory for her expanding population. Korea can be used for colonization only by exterminating the Korean people, which is beyond her power. Korea comprises but 84,400 square miles, with a population of some 20,000,000, or 239 to the square mile. This density of population forbids any other alternative. The policy has been attempted, yet during the comparative long period of Japanese occupation only 300,000 Japanese have made Korea their abode. They came not to develop, but to exploit.

We are aware of the fact that Japan has claimed that certain treaties were made after the treaty of alliance between Korea and Japan in 1904, by which Korea voluntarily gave up her sovereignty to Japan.

If we but consider what must have been the attitude and the temper of the Korean people at this time, we realize how absurd and impossible this would be. How could the Koreans forget the murder of their Queen and the poisoning of their Emperor? Could they forget how Japan came into Korea, protesting love and friendship under a treaty of alliance, and how, flushed with the victory over Russia, which the Koreans themselves made possible, the Japanese threw off the guise of friendship and violated their treaty of alliance, refusing to withdraw their troops, and have continued their military possession to this day? Korea has never been put back in the position she was in before the treaty of alliance, where she could defend herself. Japan never placed her in statu quo. Consequently nothing that Japan has done or that she has procured to be done under the menace of this military occupation can be used by Japan to justify her retention of Korea. The facts regarding the treaties said to have been made during this term of duress were covered in the "brief for Korea," which was filed with the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes in April, 1921, and for convenience we attach hereto a copy of that brief as Appendix No. 3.

Should this conference complete its labors and adjourn without heeding the plea of Korea, its work, however beneficent otherwise, will leave to posterity an Asiatic Alsace-Lorraine problem to plague its conscience, threaten its peace, and disturb the finality of every adjustment of international relations.

Finally, it may be asserted that Korea's right to be heard by this conference rests upon the solemn sanction of treaty obligations. Apart from the failure of the members of this conference to observe their covenants with Korea when called upon to exercise their good offices in her behalf when unjustly assailed by Japan at the threshold of her aggressive policies, there remains the fact that Korea is the unhappy victim of her abiding trust in the sanctity of international agreements. Not force, but fraud, gave Japan possession of Korean territory and Korean sovereignty. Her treaty of alliance with Korea against Russia in 1904 made Korea her indispensable base of operations against the common enemy, in acknowledgment for which great advantage she covenanted to safeguard Korea's independence and territorial integrity for all time. Then, victorious over Russia, she forged her treaty into a weapon for the undoing of Korea. The burden of the yoke then fashioned for the necks of her unhappy people has been made heavier by the indifference of the nations to their obligations. This great conference, whose convocation has been greeted as the harbinger of a new era in world affairs, constitutes the final tribunal of appeal for Korea. She asks for justice and nothing more.

Hers is the far eastern problem in all its phases. She is both its exponent and the finished example of Japanese ambitions. Her fate, if permitted to remain unremedied, will be the fate of Asia unless prevented by a resort to the ultimo ratio of nations.

COTTON GINNED OF THE CROP OF 1921.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to submit a Senate resolution, for which I should like to have immediate consideration. The resolution simply proposes to direct the Census Bureau to obtain from the ginners direct and not from the platforms the number and weight of the bales of cotton which have been ginned this year. That bureau has issued a preliminary statement to the effect that they could not differentiate between the bales of cotton of this year and of last year, because they had obtained their statistics from the platforms—that is, where the cotton was sold—that on account of the carry over from last year the bales of cotton which were ginned last year were mixed with the bales of cotton which were ginned this year; and that, therefore, there was no way to determine the average weight of the bales of cotton produced from the crop of this year. The resolution follows language which was indicated to me by the bureau, and it will not involve any expenditure. I am advised that if this proposed direction of the Senate shall be followed they may get the information which is so essential to the welfare of the producers of cotton. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered this morning. I repeat that it involves no additional expense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the information of the Senate the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 192) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director of the Census be, and hereby is, directed to ascertain from the ginners, for the period from August 1, 1921, to December 1, 1921, the total number of bales of cotton ginned by each ginner, the total weight of the cotton ginned, and the average weight per bale, and to find the average weight per bale of the total number of bales thus reported, and to report the same to the Senate as early as possible, such findings and report not to include linters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

RURAL HOMES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to suggest, if the morning business is closed, that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business, in order thereby to expedite matters; but, of course, if some other Senator has a matter which he desires to have taken up and disposed of before 2 o'clock, I shall not interfere.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as Senators know, I am detained from the Chamber every morning and every afternoon because of the hearings now being held before the Finance Committee. There is a bill on the calendar which passed the Senate in the last Congress, known as the rural homes bill, which I think ought to be again passed and go to the House for action just as soon as possible. I can not conceive of any objection to the bill. It is not sectional in character at all; it involves the swamp lands of the South, the cut-over lands of the Northwest, and the semiarid lands of the West. It has received the unanimous indorsement of all of the Secretaries of the Interior since and including Secretary Lane.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the calendar number of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is Order of Business 118.

Mr. President, if we can not pass the bill before 2 o'clock, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate in its consideration to-day, and we might just as well go on with the unfinished business; but I want to say frankly to the Senate that I am sure there are at least $15,000,000 waiting to be put into projects which would fall under the provisions of this bill, and I have no doubt that there will be more lands redeemed in all sections of the country under the bill than have been redeemed under the reclamation program itself. It is not going to cost the Government of the United States a penny.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, has the bill been reported?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am simply making a statement now, and then I am going to ask the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] if he thinks that the bill could be passed between now and 2 o'clock.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement, but I did not understand that the bill was on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. It is on the calendar, being Order of Business No. 118, and I should like to move to take it up at this time if it could be passed before 2 o'clock.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought the Senator stated the bill had not been reported from the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstood me; I thought the Senator asked if it had been read.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the bill has been reported by a committee and is on the calendar?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, and it passed the Senate in the last Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, replying to my colleague, I will say that I have no idea as to the length of time that will be consumed in the discussion of the bill to which he has referred. It may be passed in a very few moments and it may provoke some discussion. I think the Senator from New York and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], as well as myself, gave some little attention to this bill when it was once before under consideration. There are some very meritorious provisions contained in the bill, and yet I fancy that I can perceive some dangers that will result from its passage. I do not desire to interpose an objection to its consideration, but I do not wish to give any assurance to my colleague as to the length of time that it will take to pass the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not have made the suggestion if I could be here in the Senate at the regular sessions of the Senate, but that is impossible, because of the fact that I am compelled to attend the hearings before the Finance Committee, and unless I could have the assurance that the bill could be passed before 2 o'clock, I should not want to take the time of the Senate. Therefore, in view of the circumstances, the Senator from Washington may as well call up the unfinished business, and I will take advantage of the first opportunity which is afforded to call the rural homes bill up, because I know what it means to all sections of the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it applies as well to the swamp and overflowed lands as it does to the arid lands?

Mr. SMOOT. It does.

Mr. FLETCHER. It involves the reclamation of such lands under the national Reclamation Service?

Mr. SMOOT. It affects privately owned lands. Under the bill the Government of the United States may make surveys provided the owners of the lands will put up the money necessary for that purpose. The Government of the United States now has an efficient Reclamation Service with a complete organization. Money can not be put into all projects which may be brought up by every individual. Past experience has demonstrated that the losses in connection with such procedure are so great that money will not go into them. All the bill does is to allow the Reclamation Service of the Government to make surveys of projects, and, if those projects are approved, there is every assurance in the world that the money will be forthcoming on the part of banks and individuals in certain sections of the country to make the development. I know of projects that are now waiting to be acted upon that will require over $15,000,000, which projects will be financed without a dollar of cost to the Treasury of the United States.

I know of no section of the country that is so much interested in this proposed legislation as is the South. Land organizations from that section of the country have passed resolutions, copies of which I have in my office, approving the bill, and, as I have said, Secretary Lane, Secretary Payne, and Secretary Fall have heartily approved it. I repeat, furthermore, that it has already passed the Senate once at a previous session.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have been receiving communications from a number of organizations in the South approving of what is called the Bankhead-Borah bill, which provides a different plan, as I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a different bill entirely. If the Senator desires, I will bring over the resolutions which have been passed by southern organizations in behalf of this bill and which have been in my office since last year, when the legislation was first proposed. Those organizations, I will say to the Senator, had a considerable hand in preparing the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no conflict between this bill and the Borah-Bankhead bill, is there?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, none whatever; none whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. If the bill has passed the Senate before, and there is no opposition to it, why can we not dispose of it now?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that there is opposition to it. My colleague [Mr. KING] wants to say something about it. Therefore I shall not ask for action at this time; but I give notice now that at the very first opportunity I shall call up the bill for consideration.

REVENUES FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 205, the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 205) relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand we were in the midst of a roll call on a motion to recommit when the bill was laid aside last night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to recommit, on which a roll call was started, and a quorum was not present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ERNST (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARREL] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. As he is absent, and I am unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD (when his name was called). I voted yesterday on this question under a misapprehension, and I change my vote now from "nay" to "yea." I vote "yea."

Mr. WELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KING (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I observe that he is not in the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As my pair, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], is absent and I am unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer in his absence to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. I offered an amendment yesterday. I ask permission to withdraw it temporarily, as I understand that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] desires to offer an amendment which logically should precede the one which I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is withdrawn. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 5, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "States" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. The rate of taxation in the District of Columbia shall be fair and reasonable, and the revenues derived from this source shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous revenue.

SEC. 3. Until otherwise provided by law, the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia on personal and real estate shall be $1.75 per hundred, and other taxes shall be as now provided.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement with reference to the amendment, although I think that pretty nearly all that could be said on the subject was said yesterday.

The present ratio of 50-50 was adopted in 1878, when the bonded indebtedness of the District of Columbia, as I now recall, was somewhere between thirty-eight and fifty million dollars; I do not remember the exact amount. The revenues of the District of Columbia were very inadequate. There had been prior to that a District government, which was known as local self-government, under which the District had been plunged hopelessly into debt, and was bankrupt. A joint committee of Congress was appointed, and the scheme of government which is now in existence was devised in 1878, under which the Government of the United States undertook to pay 50 per cent of the expenses of the District of Columbia. The law also provided that the District commissioners could not estimate for or recommend an appropriation in excess of twice the amount of the District revenues.

That has been the law from that day to this. There came a time when that system raised more money than was needed, and a certain clique in control of the affairs in the District of Columbia came back to Congress and lobbied through Congress—and I speak advisedly—a scheme by which they cut down the rate of assessment on real estate to $1 a hundred, while the rate of assessment on personal property was to remain at a dollar and a half.

In other words, if a man owned a house and rented it, he paid only $1 per hundred tax, but if some widow rented a house and had a few dollars' worth of property, consisting of mules and drays, engaged, we will say, in transporting goods on the street, she paid on that personal property $1.50 a hundred.

It was necessary to cut the rate in order that the old system requiring the Government to pay one-half of the expenses might be maintained, otherwise they would accumulate a surplus, and in order that the benefits might fall on those who were least meritorious, that those who were least able to pay should continue to pay and those who were most able to pay be relieved even of that which they had to pay, they cut the rate on real estate, but kept the same rate on personal property.

There has been a fight, to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] seems to have only waked up recently, ever since I have been in Congress, and I was in the House eight years before I was translated to this body. I know the fight was an ancient one when I came to Congress and existed as long as the injustice rankled in the breasts of people who studied the system, and I say honestly and seriously, aside from the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who has given the subject careful consideration, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who says he has, I have never known anyone else who took the time and the pains to accurately inform himself of the true condition and who undertook to defend it. It is indefensible.

I say, sir, that a man living in the District of Columbia, enjoying all the advantages which citizenship here affords—magnificent parks, broad, well-lighted, well-cleaned streets, beautiful scenery, magnificent libraries and art galleries and museums—ought to pay at least as much as the man who lives in some little village in New Jersey, or Delaware, or Maine, or Arkansas, or North Carolina. I know, and I speak advisedly, that if the people of my home town could enjoy the advantages which people here in the District of Columbia enjoy, although they now pay nearly three times as much taxes as people here pay, would be perfectly willing to be assessed additional sums to get the additional advantages.

I do not think the people in my State are different from those in many other States; I know they are not. In addition to paying already more than three times as much tax as people pay here in the District of Columbia, and enjoying infinitely fewer advantages than people here enjoy, if they want to maintain their public schools for 10 months in the year, with teachers with the approximate training possessed by the teachers here, they have to go into their pockets and pay.

I know it, because I have done it, and I know our people have. I know that the people in my home town, a small place, had to raise $30,000 last year to supplement the revenues in order to give them a 10-month free school, and yet on the real value of their property they were paying three times as much as the people here are paying. I have paid taxes in both places, and I know, and I know that I know. I know that the people in the District of Columbia, if you do not consider their extra advantages, if you say they are no greater than those of the people living in other communities of like population, are paying less than half, I think less than one-third, what people pay elsewhere.

In addition, in most places, to paying their regular taxes—State, county, and municipal—and school and road assessments, if they have a public improvement they pay for that. In my home town, which I think is not an exception, the abutting property owner pays for the pavements; he pays for the sidewalks, he pays the water and light and sewer assessments, and all public improvements have to be paid for by the people who enjoy them. None of those things are paid for here by the property owners. They make a very great deal of noise and complaint, and the present commissioners have devoted their entire time to two things: One of them goes out and stops somebody who has a Ford car—and nobody with one better than that is interfered with—and runs to the newspapers and reports his activity, and goes to a citizens' association and makes a speech and calls attention to the great efforts he is putting forth in behalf of good government.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is mistaken when he says the property owners do not contribute to the expense of paving. I believe they do under the law.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator lives on Massachusetts Avenue and owns property there. If he ever paid one 5-cent piece for the improvement of that street I will vote for any bill he will introduce. Let the Senator get his tax receipts and read them. He never paid a penny for the improvement of that street.

Mr. FLETCHER. No improvement has been made on Massachusetts Avenue since I have been living there.

Mr. CARAWAY. Nobody who ever lived there ever paid for any improvement to that street in the matter of paving.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a law which requires the property owner to pay one-half of the paving cost.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was coming to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just wait a moment. I do not concede that the Senator fully stated the case.

Mr. FLETCHER. Several Senators have said that they have paid one-half of the expenses of paving.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was going to state what the Senator said he thought he paid. The Borland amendment was put on in the House while I was a Member of that body. It provided that in newly improved districts, where the streets were unopened, that the abutting property owners should pay 50 per cent and the Government pay 50 per cent; but that relates to additions which are newly laid out. It does not include the city proper, and the people living in the city proper never paid, and the Senator never paid, a penny, nor did the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] ever pay a penny for improvements in the old city proper.

Mr. BALL. I paid one-half of the cost of the improvements in front of my property.

Mr. CARAWAY. Where is the Senator's home?

Mr. BALL. Thirty-two forty-four Thirty-eighth Street.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not within the old city proper.

Mr. BALL. No; it is not.

Mr. CARAWAY. I said that, and the Senator understood it, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who got up to deny it, knows that in the old city proper they never paid a penny, and I know it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah did not rise to deny it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, conversation in other parts of the Chamber is louder than the conversation in the center of the Chamber, and while they are both going on at the same time it is impossible to hear either one of them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Those people who are carrying on the conversation have already made up their minds to vote for the 50–50 proposition; they do not want any information about it, and I could not give it to them. I do not object to their conversation.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator the other question I rose to ask him?

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wanted to correct what I thought was a misapprehension on his part with regard to the paving expenses, because I understood the Senator to say that in this city there was no contribution toward paving by the property owners.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know about the Borland law; everybody knows about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not captious about that at all, but aside from that I was going to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the property owners pay more than a dollar on the hundred on their real estate?

Mr. CARAWAY. I told the Senator the history of that. The real estate assessment went up to $1.95. It has been cut again, because they were raising too much revenue, and they set about relieving those who were ablest to pay.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator's amendment proposes to make it $1.75, I understood.

Mr. CARAWAY. Until Congress shall have an opportunity to investigate and fix a fair and reasonable rate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was just going to ask if that is not about what it is now.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the speech the Senator is making, and I would like to be able to hear him, but certainly no one can be heard who is trying to make a speech at this time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am not appealing to anybody not to carry on a conversation. I know that when I fail to interest, Senators have a perfect right to find entertainment wherever they may.

The Senator from Florida asked me a question about the $1.75 rate. I do not know whether that is the present rate or not. I do not want the people living in the District of Columbia to pay a rate that is unfair or unjust. I do not want them to pay any special taxes on account of the special advantages they enjoy; I am not urging that. I want them to pay what would be commensurate with what is paid in communities of like population and like advantages elsewhere, and then I am perfectly willing to have the Federal Government make up any deficit. Let the amount to be paid by the United States be whatever it may, I shall vote for it; but until the rate of taxation is made more nearly equal to that paid in like communities elsewhere, I do not see how anybody can defend it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator's amendment proposes to levy a tax of $1.75 a hundred?

Mr. CARAWAY. Until otherwise fixed by law.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was under the impression that the tax amounted to about that now.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought that was about the present rate. As I first wrote the amendment, it provided that the tax should be as provided by law. A Senator on the other side who was interested in the amendment suggested that I ought to put in some definite figure, inasmuch as the commissioners may raise or lower the rate, under their power, and I wrote into the amendment what I thought was about the present rate—$1.75.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We all want to accomplish the same thing. There is just a difference of judgment as to the best method of bringing it about. I have conferred with several Senators who are interested in the proposition, and we can see no serious objection to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. One dollar and seventy-five cents is a little more than the regular fixed rate now. The fixed rate on real estate and tangible personal property is now $1.50. Under the authority of the last two appropriation bills the commissioners have had the power to raise it not exceeding, I think, 2 per cent.

Mr. CARAWAY. They did raise it to $1.95, did they not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They raised it, I think, to $1.95. The Senator's amendment makes the rate of taxation certain and definite, and it seems to me that that will tell to the people of the District of Columbia, as certainly as can be, the amount of taxes they will have to meet, and with that proposition included I do not see any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas; that is, any serious objection.

I do think it is really better for the District if Congress is obligated to raise a certain amount, and it would do that probably more freely if the people have to put up a similar amount. But the responsibility for the District is primarily upon Congress. The Senator's amendment places the responsibility clearly upon us if the needs of the District are neglected, and I do not think we ought to take the position that Congress really can not be depended upon to take care of the District. So that, in order to get a solution of this controversy we have been having for years over the appropriation bills and in the hope that this may result in a solution, and also in order to avoid further discussion, so far as I am concerned, I will agree to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thank the Senator, and I have nothing further to say.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I wanted to ask the Senator from Washington, who has the bill in charge, whether the amendment tendered by the Senator from Arkansas in his opinion would interfere in any manner with what are denominated special assessments? I think we ought not to interfere with them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood from the reading of the amendment that it would not, and I understand it will not interfere with the intangible tax law we have on the books. It affects only the tax on real estate and tangible personal property, as I understand the amendment.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator what tax is now imposed upon franchises, and upon what the Senator has denominated as intangible property?

Mr. JONES of Washington. My recollection is that the tax on intangible property is three-tenths of 1 per cent; but I am not sure about it. That was mentioned yesterday, I know, by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who is really the author of it. I do not think there is any tax on franchises. Possibly there is room for legislation revising the tax system of the District, and this does not hamper Congress in any way. Of course the Senator knows that we could not bind Congresses of the future, but this merely makes the tax definite and certain until Congress legislates further upon the question.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, if tax dodgers in the various States obtain a fictitious or nominal residence in the District of Columbia, as some have done, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of honest taxes in their own States, under the head of intangible property we would tax them here only three-tenths of 1 per cent?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is probably true; but I want to say to the Senator that he is not any more in favor of catching tax dodgers than I am, so far as that is concerned. I will join with him in aiding in the framing of legislation to effect the discovery of tax dodgers, if there are any here.

The bill is not really an attempt, as the Senator knows, to revise the taxes. That is quite a problem, and it is one we can not solve on the floor of the Senate and one that would require very careful consideration. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] mentioned yesterday several reasons why the amount of the intangible property tax probably was put as low as it is, simply because it was believed that by putting it low we would get more tax than we would if we raised it high. There is room, of course, for difference of opinion about that, but, as I said, I will join with the Senator—he and I are both members of the Committee on the District of Columbia—whenever he is ready and desires to do so, to try to work out a proper basis of taxation for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. At our next committee meeting I shall move that a subcommittee be appointed for the purpose of drafting a suitable tax law to deal with the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall vote with the Senator, hoping that I shall not be on the subcommittee, however.

Mr. KING. The reason why I moved to recommit the bill was because it seemed to me that now is an opportune time to draft a comprehensive revenue system for the District, one which in a progressive and proper way would deal with the question of taxation. There is too much property, in my opinion, escaping taxation in the District. We have put the intangible tax rate so low that it is an invitation to residents of the States to come here in order that they may avoid taxation at home. The low tax here is a mere bagatelle and invites them to come for that purpose.

I thank the Senator from Nebraska for yielding to me.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not sure that I fully understand the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. As I do understand it, however, I am in favor of it. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if his amendment proposes to strike out all reference to any division such as 50–50 or 60–40.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; it does.

Mr. NORRIS. I have always thought that the basis of taxation in the District, based on any ratio, was illogical and unfair. It seems to me that 50–50, or 60–40, or 5–5–3, or 10–10–7, or any other ratio, is not based upon any logical or sound reasoning of the situation. We all know—and I believe it is conceded by everybody—that the Government of the United States will have to pay a portion of the money necessary to support the District. I think those who have considered it realize that that is not only necessary but it is fair. Whether it should be on a basis of 50–50 or 60–40 depends altogether, it seems to me, upon what is done in the way of improvements, and so forth, in the District. There might be times and occasions when, if it was based on a 50–50 ratio, it would be unfair to the District, and there might be times when it would be unfair to the Government.

All we have a right to demand of the taxpayer of the District and all the taxpayer in the District has a right to demand of the Government is that he shall pay an honest tax upon his property. When that is paid, if it is sufficient to run the affairs of the District, well and good. If it lacks, the balance must be made up by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, that in effect is what he seeks and does accomplish by his amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to interrupt me?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska I would like to call his attention to this fact, a historic fact. The District of Columbia was nationalized for very good reasons. We are taxing these people and giving them no representation. When I was a Member of the House 30 years ago the 50–50 plan had been in operation, as I was informed, for very many years, and so far as I know it continued to be in operation for many years. We deny the citizens of Washington any representation. The 50–50 plan was agreed upon as a part of the general scheme of having a national capital with no statehood, no Territorial rights, but a national status.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am very anxious to hear the Senator from Georgia and he is speaking loudly enough to be heard, but there are a number of other Senators talking in the Chamber at the same time, and it is impossible for me to hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will again state that it seems to me due consideration ought to be given to the fact that a peculiar condition applies to the people of the District of Columbia, in that they are taxed and are not represented. We govern the District through a committee. Congress virtually acts as the town council. The District has nothing to do with it. Washington has nothing to do with it. We are the town council, elected from all over the Union to this body and the other body, and we govern the conditions here in the Capital City and this nationalized District. Should it not be taken into consideration that we are dealing with a historic and anomalous condition of things which brought about the nationalization of the District of Columbia instead of giving it Territorial rights or statehood?

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator from Delaware. I think what the Senator from Georgia has said is recognized by all of us. It is a peculiar condition. I do not care to discuss now, however, the history or the necessity of continuing the present form of government in the District of Columbia. Much could be said on the question of representation in the District. I will say in passing that personally I feel that it is the duty of Congress to retain within itself the power of governing the District.

Now, we want, of course, always to be just with every taxpayer, and when we levy a tax that is fair and that is just the taxpayer has no complaint so far as taxation is concerned. We have no right to levy, if we want to be fair—and I assume that we do—anything but a fair and just tax.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I must first yield to the Senator from Delaware, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BALL. I wish to call attention to one feature of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. As I understand it, there is in the United States Treasury a surplus resulting from the District of Columbia taxpayers having paid more than their proportion of the 50–50 proposition as called for under that plan. The Government expended only a part of the money raised by taxation for a number of years back. This left a surplus of something in the neighborhood of $5,000,000. As I understand the amendment, that $5,000,000, together with the taxes raised in the future, reverts back to the general fund in the United States Treasury. I think that is unfair to the citizens of Washington, whose government is entirely in the hands of Congress, who paid this additional tax in good faith. It should be used and expended for the benefit of the District and not go into the general fund of the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I think as an abstract proposition that what the Senator has said is absolutely correct. If, however, we are going to proceed on the theory that the Government of the United States is to appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States whatever may be necessary to carry on the government of the District, then it becomes immaterial what happens to that $5,000,000 or what happens to any other money that is paid by taxation into the Treasury of the United States from the District.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say to the Senator that I did not understand, when I expressed myself about the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, that it affected the other provision of the bill relating to surplus. I have talked with him and he has said that had not occurred to him at all and that he was not intending to strike out the provision with reference to that.

I agree with the Senator from Delaware that the surplus should be expended for the District. I wished to make that statement, so my position would be understood. I believe we can rearrange the language to take care of that. I wanted to suggest that while the Senator was discussing the proposition.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I wish to state that I have no objection to the amendment or substitute, as it really is, provided those matters are taken care of; but, as we have so much agitation in the District now for representation in Congress, there being taxation without representation, as they express it, we ought to be extremely careful not to do anything which may tend to aggravate that condition.

Mr. NORRIS. I find no fault with what the Senator has said, as I said before, but I believe if the amendment is agreed to it will be absolutely immaterial what is done with that $5,000,000. I have no objection to providing, if it will suit anybody, that the $5,000,000 shall be utilized for the government of the District. If we do that, we release the Government of the United States in that same amount. As I look at it, it is absolutely immaterial, and I have no objection to any provision the Senator may want to put in if he thinks it is material.

If we proceed on the theory that we are going to tax the people of the District of Columbia a certain amount which we decide to be fair and just and that then, regardless of how much money that may raise and put into the Treasury we are going to pay for the management and government of the District out of the Treasury of the United States, it becomes absolutely immaterial, as I see it, whether we turn that $5,000,000 over and say nothing about it or whether we provide by law that that shall first be used before we use anything else. The money is not any different from any other $5,000,000. If we should try to get it out of the Treasury now, we would not get the identical money that was put in. We would only get $5,000,000. So what is the difference? It seems to me there is absolutely none.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted by the very logical suggestion that was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], I was about to call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to a condition of which he has several times spoken in this debate; that is, as to the tax dodger who comes to the District of Columbia to avoid taxation in the State where he has previously lived. I suppose that occurs; I have had called to my attention in years past several instances of that kind; but, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah will not, in my judgment, reach the tax dodger by providing for the payment of a tax on intangible property at the same rate that he may propose to tax tangible property. That is a point that I do not intend to discuss in detail, but I believe it is the conclusion of students who have made a life study of the taxation problem—a problem that has been before us ever since we have had any civilization, and always will be—that a light tax on intangible property will bring more money into the Treasury than will a heavy tax. It is that theory, as I understand, of tax students that has induced several States and induced the Congress in legislating for the District of Columbia to provide for a light tax on intangible property, because history has shown, I think, from the beginning of civilization that where intangible property is taxed at the regular rate for other property and at its full value the law has not been able to reach intangible property for taxation. No legislature has ever yet discovered a method by which to reach the dishonest man, who entirely escapes taxation on his intangible property, and the honest man, therefore, pays a higher rate than he would pay if everybody paid a fair tax.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator. I may be mistaken, but, as I recall, the State of Pennsylvania started out several years ago to levy a very light tax on intangible property, with the result that that State increased by many millions the revenues which were secured from the taxation of that kind of property in the State. I may be mistaken as to the State; I am speaking only from memory; but similar action has been taken in several States, with a like result.

It may be that men have come to the District of Columbia in order to escape taxation because they have had a large amount of intangible property and it was taxed lightly here and taxed heavily somewhere else. At the time the existing law fixing the present rate of taxation on such property in the District was enacted it seemed to be the judgment of experts on the proposition that it would raise a larger amount of money than a higher rate would raise, paradoxical as that statement may seem at first blush. However, the point which the Senator from Utah makes is an excellent one.

There is another tax which people dodge by coming to the District of Columbia, from some of the States at least. It is a tax that does not apply to any specific kind of property. There are quite a number of States—perhaps, it is true as to most States—that levy inheritance taxes. Some of those taxes are progressive in their nature, so that on a very large estate upon the death of the owner a large amount is collected. The District of Columbia has no inheritance tax. It is our fault that it does not have one. If we had in the District of Columbia an inheritance tax, we would, in my judgment, to a considerable extent, relieve the situation of people coming here for the purpose of escaping taxes.

I had called to my attention several years ago litigation that was then pending in the court involving the estate of a very wealthy man who had come here from one of the States, and who had been a candidate for Senator even after he had come here, but who died here. The question arose as to whether he was a resident of the District of Columbia or of the State in which he had formerly lived.

The case involved the question of inheritance taxes amounting to several hundred thousand dollars. If he were a resident of the District of Columbia his estate escaped those taxes, but if he were not a resident of the District, his estate was liable. I submit to the Senator from Utah, who is on the District Committee, and who has told the Senate that at the next meeting of the committee he proposes to move the appointment of a subcommittee to take up this question, that if he will see that a bill is presented to Congress, and will assist us in passing it, that will provide for an inheritance tax in the District of Columbia similar to inheritance taxes that are provided in many of the States, he will, to a great extent, solve the question of the tax dodger. Now, I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in what I said respecting the taxing of intangible property, I may have been unfortunate in my language. What I intended to say was that I was in favor of taxing intangible property. I did not particularly complain of the rate here, but let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is a difficult thing to reach intangible property. If there were a local income tax law applicable to the District, that would be the surest and most effective way of reaching intangible property.

In some States which have adopted it, the system of taxing intangible property works disadvantageously; it is unjust. For instance, it may be said that some person by reason of an advantageous position upon a street in connection with the conduct of his business has some intangible value or property in the locus, and he ought to pay taxes upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. In my judgment, such a tax would be a very unjust tax.

Mr. KING. It would be a very unjust tax. I think any intangible tax, unless it is properly guarded, is a dangerous thing.

Mr. NORRIS. It is.

Mr. KING. I think the best way is to have an income tax. Then the income upon intangible property is reached.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. A fair method of taxing intangible property may be devised, and yet it is a very difficult thing. I concede all that the learned Senator has so forcefully said. I am complaining generally though of the fact that people do take refuge here, some of them, in order to escape the income tax and the inheritance tax of their respective States, and they make enormous profits by transferring their residence here and escaping a fair income tax, the tax on intangible property, and the estate tax of the State from which they come.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am much obliged to the Senator from Utah for his statement. There is much force in it, and I think it would be well when the Senator and his subcommittee get to work for them to consider the proposition of a District income tax such as many States have. I know, however, that the Senator would not want to work out a tax system designed to reach the tax dodger coming into the District which would result in an unfair burden on the people of the District. For instance, if some one who lived in a State where there was levied an unjust and unfair tax, such as the one in the illustration given by him, came to the District for the purpose of avoiding that tax, the Senator would not want to enact any law to prohibit him from doing that which would tax him in a similar way here. In other words, if in the District we should endeavor to meet all conditions, we would have to levy taxes here that would sometimes be unjust if there was any State where there was an unjust tax from which anyone was trying to escape.

It is not always fair, Mr. President, even as the Senator has outlined, to provide an income tax with the idea of bringing about complete justice in the taxing of intangible property. It is true we would get, as the Senator from Utah very well says, a tax on the income derived from such property, but, unless there was some differentiation made in the law as to the different sources of income, it might result in double taxation on tangible property, because tangible property being assessed would, if it brought in any income, have to pay another tax in the way of an income tax. So there are always difficulties. As I have already said, one difficulty with the intangible tax which has never yet been met by any taxing system devised by man is to bring out for taxation property that can so easily be concealed and covered up. The only feasible plan, so far as I know, that has ever been devised has been to tax such property at a light rate so that the honest man can afford to bring it forth and the dishonest man can not afford to run the risk of trying to avoid the payment of a reasonable tax.

But, Mr. President, we have not all those questions before us now. I think we ought to consider them; I think we ought to have in the taxing system of the District a slight exemption on improvements, one that would apply to all property alike.

Let it be fixed at a reasonable amount so that what if we should allow an exemption of $2,500 on improvements on real estate, for instance, it would apply to the block that cost $1,000,000 as well as to the home that cost only $2,500. Such an exemption would result in a little higher tax on property that is held for speculation. I think in the District—it is true to a great extent of other large cities, but it is particularly true with respect to the city of Washington—that a very large amount of vacant property is held unimproved purely and solely for speculative purposes. If we can do so fairly, we ought to tax that kind of property a little heavier than the property which has been improved, and we can do that by allowing a reasonable exemption for improvements on property. That would tend to reduce rents in the District of Columbia, which is a very desirable consideration; and it would tend also to the construction of homes and the owning of homes by individuals, which is another very desirable consideration.

Under present conditions the man who has a piece of property and plants a rose bush on it increases his taxation; he is penalized for every improvement that he makes. If he builds a little home and puts on it another coat of paint and thus adds a little to its value the tax collector adds a little to the tax he must pay. If the property owner does something of that kind that improves the general condition of the community, he is penalized for doing it, while the speculator who does nothing of the kind gets the benefit in the increased value of his property by every improvement that is made by every man who toils and puts a block of pavement in a street; so that every drop of sweat, every effort that is made in the way of improvement adds something to enhance the value of the speculator's property. We can meet that, and the only way I know of meeting it is to allow a reasonable exemption for improvement on real estate; and I want to submit that idea to the District Committee so that when they get the subject under consideration they can give to it such weight as they think it deserves. It seems to me it would go a long way toward reducing the cost of living and adding to the number of people who own their own homes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I appreciate the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska with reference to the surplus. I think there is no answer to that suggestion; but there has been accumulated in the District, out of the revenues paid by the people under the half-and-half system, some four or five millions of dollars. Under the law as heretofore, as I called attention to yesterday, the commissioners have been limited in their power to submit estimates to Congress to the needs of the District. They have not been able even to submit estimates to Congress that would enable, under the rules of Congress, the appropriation of that money especially for much-needed school facilities in the District.

I think there ought not to be any limit placed upon the estimates that the commissioners can send to Congress as to the needs of the District. Then, of course, the responsibility rests with Congress as to whether or not it will appropriate the money to meet those needs, and that is one of the purposes of this bill; so I desire to propose this amendment, when the proper time comes, as another section of the bill.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that it is proper now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is pending. I merely want to read this for information. I am not offering the amendment now, but simply reading it for information, and giving notice that I will offer it when the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is disposed of. It will be a new section, to be known, I think, as section 4.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator whether the amendment which he is about to read now would not be a proper amendment to that offered by the Senator from Arkansas, perfecting his amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it would not.

Mr. KING. It is not in the third degree.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; what I intend to propose is really another section of the bill.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator could tender it now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am going to read it, anyhow, and I may offer it when we come to vote on the Senator's amendment. Anyhow, I want to read it now for the information of the Senate, so that those who desire may think about it:

The appropriation of an amount equal to the unexpended or unappropriated surpluses of the District revenues shown by the reports of the commissioners to have been heretofore accumulated and deposited in the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the estimates submitted for the next fiscal year, is hereby authorized; and hereafter there shall be no limit upon the amount of the estimates to be submitted to Congress to meet the annual needs of the District, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator explain the significance of that amendment; and may I inquire, so that he may answer it if he chooses, whether it is purposed by his amendment to require the Government of the United States to duplicate the fund which has been accumulated in the Treasury, and which amounts to between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, or whether that may be expended by the District Commissioners without calling for a similar amount out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The purpose is just this: Of course, if this bill should pass as now proposed to be amended, as the Senator has suggested, it does not make any difference about this surplus. Congress has to appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States everything that is necessary to take care of the needs of the District, and if we should put up $5,000,000, of course there would be that $5,000,000 less that we would have to appropriate hereafter, so that it really does not make any difference. But here is the situation:

We are confronted with our rules and with the law limiting the commissioners in their estimates for this year for the District. I do not know whether those estimates are ample to cover the actual and pressing needs of the District or not. If this amendment should be adopted, it would give authority to the Committee on Appropriations, for instance, if it saw fit to do it, to make provision for the appropriation of this amount in addition to the regular estimates that have come down. That is all the authority it gives. We might appropriate $1,000,000, we might appropriate $500,000, we might appropriate nothing, but it gives us authority. In other words, no point of order could be made against the proposition; and then it removes hereafter the limitation upon the power of the commissions to submit estimates to Congress for the pressing needs of the District. Those are the two propositions involved in the amendment.

Mr. President, I desire to offer this as an amendment to the amendment. I think I had better read it; I am afraid the Secretary could not read it:

SEC. 4. The appropriation of an amount equal to the unexpended or unappropriated surpluses of the District revenues shown by the reports of the commissioners to have been heretofore accumulated and deposited in the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the estimates submitted for the next fiscal year, is hereby authorized; and hereafter there shall be no limit upon the amount of the estimates to be submitted to Congress to meet the annual needs of the District, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair.) The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas proposing to insert certain words by adding to those words a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. The appropriation of an amount equal to the unexpended or unappropriated surpluses of the District revenues shown by the reports of the commissioners to have been heretofore accumulated and deposited in the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the estimates submitted for the next fiscal year, is hereby authorized; and hereafter there shall be no limit upon the amount of the estimates to be submitted to Congress to meet the annual needs of the District, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire now to offer an amendment. I have not before me the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, but I think it will go in very well right at the close of the amendment just agreed to.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I have a copy of it here, which I send to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not take the time of the Senate to go over it now; but, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I offer it as section 5, a new section of the amendment. It is carrying out what I believe to be very fair. I may be wrong in the amount that I have placed here; it may be too small, or it may be too large; but it seemed to me that one desirable thing, if possible, was to tax just a little higher real estate held for speculation, and to relieve, if possible, the penalizing of any man who makes slight improvements and builds a house, or something of that kind. So I am going to offer this amendment:

SEC. 5. In fixing the value of improvements—

I might pause here to say that under the general law applying to the District it is the duty of the taxing authorities to value the improvements separately from the real estate. If you will examine a tax receipt for real estate you will find that the improvements are valued in one column and the real estate itself in another, so that the provisions of this amendment can be very easily carried out.

In fixing the value of improvements on any lot or tract of real estate for the purpose of taxation, the first $2,500 of value thereof shall be exempt, and shall not be taken into consideration in fixing such value.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the suggestion which has been made, which I am sure will be carried into execution, the District Committee will immediately take up the matter of formulating a comprehensive revenue system for the District of Columbia, and I venture to suggest to the Senator that it might be wise to defer dealing with the question of taxation here by the adoption of the amendment which the Senator has offered, which seems very praiseworthy and commendable, because undoubtedly exemptions will be found provided for in any comprehensive and scientific tax bill. It would seem to me to be better to provide for exemptions in appropriate legislation, rather than to attempt in this bill to deal with the question of exemptions from taxation. I merely suggest that to the Senator, without any antagonism toward the spirit of the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's suggestions have a good deal of merit in them, but in answer to the Senator I want to say, and I think the experience of all of us bears me out, that those things which it is sometimes predicted will be taken care of in another bill do not very often reach the Senate. It probably would be a little more appropriate, if we had a general District of Columbia tax bill, that this should be put on that, although it seems to me it is perfectly germane to the subject under consideration, and I think that even if we had a rule which excluded all amendments which were not germane this amendment would be held to be germane in this case.

I am afraid that even with the Senator from Utah prodding the proposition, it will be a long time before a general taxation bill for this District will reach the Senate. I would like to have such a bill passed while I am still here. The Senator from Washington suggests to me that he thinks I have this amount too high.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I wanted to suggest. I think it is a little too high. My recollection is that in my State, though I do not know how it is in other States, there is an exemption of $300 allowed on personal property.

Mr. NORRIS. This has not anything to do with personal property.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Utah informs me that there is an exemption on personal property in this District of $1,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is $800.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have looked it up. I think this is a little high. I believe in the principle of it; I am in favor of the principle of it. I suggest that the Senator make it $1,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I am willing to make it $2,000. It seems to me that is low, because we can not get very much of an improvement on a piece of property in the District of Columbia for $2,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it is the Senator's intention to exempt all of the property from taxation.

Mr. NORRIS. No. I would like to do something to keep a poor man who wants to put an improvement on his property, and who makes an improvement on his lot, from being penalized while the benefit of the general prosperity that comes from his improvement enures to the speculator, who does not contribute anything toward the improvement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to penalize the man who does not put anything on his property.

Mr. NORRIS. I will change it to $2,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not object to that. Of course, the bill will have to pass the scrutiny of the House.

Mr. KING. I desire to correct an error which I inadvertently fell into a moment ago. I remembered the figures, but perhaps made the statement a little too broad. I had before me the report of Mr. MAPES, from the Committee of the District of Columbia of the House, in support of a certain measure, and I had in mind the statement which he made as to $1,000 exemption. It reads: "Tangible personal property. After exempting household furniture of the value of $1,000," and so forth, the property is subject to taxation. Household furniture to the value of $1,000 is exempted from taxation, but as to the amount of exemption for other personal property I am not able to state. I wanted to make that correction.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe there is no other exemption. I think the Senator has stated it correctly, and I misstated it a while ago when I said there was an exemption of $800. I think that applies only to household goods. There is no other exemption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS IN ANATOLIA.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, under the latitude of debate permitted in the Senate, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a matter which, in my opinion, deserves consideration, and has attracted a great deal of attention not only in the United States but throughout the world, and as a premise to my observations I desire to have the Clerk read the following resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 193), as follows:

Whereas the treaty between Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan on the one part and Turkey on the other part, signed at Sevres on the 10th day of August, 1920, makes complete and particular provision for the protection of racial and religious minorities within the territory committed to the sovereignty of Turkey, including Pontus on the southern littoral of the Black Sea; and

Whereas by article 141 of said treaty Turkey undertook specifically to assure "full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Turkey without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race, or religion, and in article 144 further undertook to facilitate the return to their homes and the restoration to their properties and business of all persons who had become exiles by reason of the terrorist régime in Turkey during the late war; and

Whereas in violation of the stipulations of said treaty and in violation of the laws and customs of nations and of the principles of national morality and of justice recognized by all civilized States the so-called Kemalist régime in Anatolia has continued the massacre of the Christian population of Anatolia, and particularly of the inhabitants of Pontus, who are of the Greek race and religion, by which such inhabitants have been deprived not only of their properties and business but have been subjected to a system of ruthless decimation and extermination; and

Whereas the Government of France has recognized the Kemalist régime as the de facto and as the lawful Government of Turkey; and

Whereas the inhabitants of Pontus have no redress or recourse for protection and vindication except by appeal to the powers which are parties to the treaty of Sevres; and

Whereas by article 151 of said treaty, said powers agreed to consult with the council of the League of Nations upon measures necessary to guarantee the execution of Part IV of said treaty, including the articles aforesaid, and the Turkish Government agreed to accept all decisions taken in that behalf: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States expresses abhorrence and condemnation of the brutal and ruthless persecution of the Greeks of Pontus by the government of Kemal Pasha and by Ottoman Turks in Anatolia and deplores the failure of the European powers to take effective measures to restore and maintain order in Anatolia in conformity to the treaty of Sevres, and to exercise the authority reserved by said powers in that behalf; and the Senate respectfully requests that the President of the United States bring the atrocities in Pontus to the attention of the European powers and the council of the League of Nations, to the end that adequate and expeditious measures be taken in accordance with said treaty, to arrest the persecution and extermination of the inhabitants of Pontus, who are of the Greek race and religion, and generally to enforce and vindicate the rights accorded racial and religious minorities in Anatolia by the said treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I sought the floor a moment ago for the purpose of submitting some observations predicated upon the resolution which has just been read. I understand the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who has an engagement which compels him to leave the Chamber shortly, desires to call up for consideration another measure, and later in the day I shall ask the Senate to listen to the observations I may care to submit upon the resolution.

DISPOSITION OF SUGAR IMPORTED FROM ARGENTINA.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the order of business at present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing before the Senate. The unfinished business has just been disposed of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 12, authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that is rather an important matter, and there ought to be a quorum here to hear the discussion and to consider the question. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard
Bursum	Glass	McKellar	Shields
Calder	Gooding	McKinley	Smith
Capper	Hale	McNary	Smoot
Caraway	Harris	Myers	Stanfield

Fernald	Ladd	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	La Follette	Reed	Willis
France	Lenroot	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over from the corporation, American Trading Co., and the copartnership, B. H. Howell, Son & Co., a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said corporation and copartnership at the request, under direction, and as agents of the Department of Justice and Department of State, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 13th day of May, 1920, and the 22d day of May, 1920, of 13,902 tons of sugar, the importation thereof into the United States and the distribution of a portion of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to dispose of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of, and to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises, paying to the corporation and copartnership aforesaid such sums as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them, or either of them, in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this joint resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the pending joint resolution is identical with a joint resolution which the Senate passed on a former occasion and sent to the House of Representatives at a period in the session of that day too late for the House to take affirmative or, indeed, negative action. It was reintroduced in this session of Congress, and again the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as it did before, reported the joint resolution with but one dissenting vote. I think I am accurate in saying that the Senator, who as a member of the committee voted against reporting the measure, did not do so on the ground of any criticism of the record or motives of the claimants, but rather as a criticism of the Government itself in embarking upon the undertaking which I am about to describe.

In the spring of 1920 the country was obsessed with fearfully high living costs, especially those costs relating to the food of the people. The Department of Justice, under the leadership of the then Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, embarked upon a campaign, as it were, to reduce the price of food. One of the food articles which had reached extraordinary heights of price upon the market was sugar. At that time, as I recollect, sugar was selling at from 25 to 30 cents a pound, an unheard of price, with a resultant hardship upon every household in the country. The Department of Justice, in an effort to reduce this price to something like a reasonable figure, happened upon the information that there was a considerable quantity of sugar in the Argentine Republic.

At that time the Argentine Government had imposed and was maintaining an embargo against the exportation of sugar from the Argentine. The Department of Justice, however, through the Department of State, instituted negotiations, semiconfidential in character at the beginning, with the Argentine Government to ascertain if the Government of the Argentine would lift that embargo as a favor to the Government of the United States.

At the same time the Department of Justice requested an American commercial concern known as the American Trading Co., a concern which had engaged in a general import and export business for many years and involved dealings in all kinds of articles which go into international commerce, to lend its service in the purchase of some sugar in the Argentine, based upon the assurance that the Argentine Government would allow the American Trading Co. to export it and bring it to the United States in an effort to smash the domestic price of sugar. The American Trading Co. was requested to perform this service on account of the fact that it had agents in the Argentine and had had them there for many years as an ordinary commercial practice.

At the same time an agreement was reached by the Department of Justice with the American Trading Co. and also with a concern known as B. H. Howell, Son & Co. for the distribution of such sugar as might be brought from the Argentine by the American Trading Co. A rigid limitation upon the price to be charged for sugar was fixed by the Department of Justice and agreed to by these concerns. The American Trading Co. was to do the purchasing in the Argentine and bring the sugar to the United States in merchant vessels and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. were to do the distributing of the sugar in this country to consumers named by the Government itself, largely canners, who were greatly in need of sugar. As I said, the price was to be fixed and was fixed by the Government.

Mr. REED. At what figure?

Mr. WADSWORTH. At 20 cents per pound, averaging 7, 8, or 9 cents below the then market price, and the profit of these American citizens who agreed to perform the service for the Government was strictly limited to 1 cent per pound delivered and distributed from the Atlantic seaboard, in this case New York.

The Department of Justice informed the American Trading Co. that the Government of the Argentine had agreed to permit the exportation of the sugar from the Argentine, and requested the American Trading Co. thereupon to purchase the sugar in that country.

I call the attention of the Senate to the committee report, Exhibit No. 1, which is a letter written by Mr. Howard Figg, special assistant to the Attorney General, to Mr. Wallace D. Franklin, vice president of the American Trading Co., under date of May 11, 1920. The first paragraph of the letter reads as follows:

> DEAR SIR: I was notified by State Department of the receipt of cable from the Argentine that upon proper presentation through official channels of the American Government that the Argentine would lift the embargo on present surpluses in that country, now amounting to some 150,000 tons.

Then the letter says that he, Mr. Figg, had made arrangements with large interests in this country to handle all or any part of the sugar that he might indicate.

Mr. REED. I do not at all wish to interrupt the thread of the Senator's statement, but it would afford me some assistance if I could know who Mr. Howard Figg is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He was special assistant to the Attorney General, and at the time of the writing of this letter he had general charge of the anti-high-cost-of-living campaign then being carried on by the Department of Justice.

Mr. REED. Very well; but I now wish to ask when the Department of Justice got into the sugar business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It did not get into the sugar business. It got an American concern into the sugar business with the results which I shall relate in a few moments.

Mr. REED. If the Department of Justice got an American concern into the sugar business, by what authority did the Department of Justice get it into the sugar business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not sure about the legal authority for inviting an American concern to render service to the Government, but the concern responded to the request and invitation of the Government in the best of faith, with the results that I am going to relate.

Mr. REED. Suppose I had invited an American concern to go out and buy a few hundred thousand or million dollars' worth of sugar and bring it over here and sell it to the American people, and they undertook it and lost money, does the Senator think that my action would bind the Government in any way?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator was occupying the position of Attorney General of the United States and acting with the authority of the President of the United States and did such a thing as that, and then, at a later time in the transaction which the Senator has not given me an opportunity to describe, intervened and absolutely prevented the American concern which had responded to the invitation from withdrawing from the undertaking, and thereby compelled the concern willy-nilly to incur a tremendous loss, I would say that it involved a moral obligation upon the part of the Government of the United States to protect its own citizens.

Mr. REED. Now, the Senator said if I did this or undertook to do this with the authority of the President. Will the Senator tell me what authority the President had, either by himself or by an agent, to go out and purchase or contract for the purchase of an immense quantity of sugar or one single pound of sugar?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can not point to a legal authority, as I said to the Senator before. I am endeavoring to prove to the Senate that there is a high moral obligation here, a moral obligation which, if it were avoided or dodged by a private citizen in business, would forever exclude that private citizen from the company of decent men.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I, of course, ought not to take the Senator's time, but I hope he will permit me merely to say this: If I have no authority to buy sugar or to bind the United States, and another man who has no authority to buy sugar or to bind the United States tells me to go and buy sugar, and I proceed to buy it, I have gained no authority from a man who himself possesses no authority. If the unauthorized man telling me to make the agreement afterwards, without authority, tells the person with whom the pretended agreement was made that he must carry it out, being still without authority, the whole transaction has back of it not one line of law and not one particle of authority, for no matter how many unauthorized men undertake to do an unauthorized act, the act is still unauthorized.

I do not want to interrupt the Senator again; I have been trenching on his time; but I wish before I sit down to ask how much money this is to cost the United States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the neighborhood of $1,000,000. That is what the citizen had to pay, and he was helpless in the matter.

Mr. REED. He was helpless?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He was helpless when once he responded to the invitation of his Government to perform a public service.

Mr. REED. But the point is that he had no invitation from the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The facts are to the contrary. In good faith he responded to the invitation of his Government.

Mr. REED. The Senator means he responded to the unauthorized request of an individual.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He had no reason to believe that the request or invitation was unauthorized.

Mr. REED. But he had the laws of his country to guide him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Time and again citizens respond to the request of a department or of the President of the United States and render a service in an emergency; it is seldom that a service of exactly this kind has been directly requested of a citizen. In this case it involved a commercial transaction in which the Government assumed to do certain things. As the case proceeded——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish the Senator would let me proceed. I have a committee meeting to attend at 2.30 o'clock.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon, but sometimes we get more light by asking questions than we do by listening to speeches.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As this transaction proceeded the Government's rigid hand was always apparent; it was always in control, and the citizen was helpless, as I shall proceed to show.

The Senator from Missouri asked what authority under the law there was for this transaction? I can not point to the specific authority under the law. I can, however, point to a high moral obligation which rests upon the Government of the United States, which has been testified to by two Attorneys General, by their subordinates, both under the Wilson administration and this administration, by the president of the Sugar Equalization Board, by the counsel of the Sugar Equalization Board, and by an overwhelming vote of the Committee on Agriculture upon two occasions.

As I was saying, Mr. Figg, special assistant to the Attorney General, informed the American Trading Co. that the State Department had received a cable that the embargo maintained by the Argentine Government against the exportation of sugar was to be lifted, and then proceeded to ask them to instruct their agents in Argentina to go out and buy the sugar. This was done in May of 1920.

To show how the United States Government took this matter up officially with the Argentine Government, I call attention to Exhibit No. 2 in the committee report, which is a cablegram dispatch to the American Embassy at Buenos Aires, Argentina, signed by Mr. Frank W. Polk, then Acting Secretary of State, dated May 13, 1920, in which Mr. Polk uses this language:

With reference to the telegrams from the department, Nos. 39, 40, and 43, and to your telegram No. 113, regarding the lifting of the embargo on sugar from Argentina: This is strictly confidential. The American Trading Co. has been appointed purchasing agent by the Department of Justice and it is being instructed by that department to obtain quietly as many options as possible before the market is aware that the embargo has been lifted, in order to avoid unduly high prices; otherwise it will be impossible to buy Argentine sugar. By this method there will be an avoidance of profiteering at this end, and the Department of Justice is safeguarding all steps so that the American household consumer may be protected.

Instructions are hereby given to you to bring this matter most confidentially to the attention of the Government of the Argentine for its information. The hope is expressed that the Argentine Government will be satisfied with this arrangement. In the near future the official request for the lifting of the embargo will be made. This is being done merely to avoid speculation, which might destroy the entire transaction, and there is no intention of preventing sugar interests in the Argentine from securing a price which is just.

POLK, Acting.

That cablegram shows that this concern, upon responding to the invitation of the Department of Justice, was named in the dispatches of the State Department to the embassy in Buenos Aires, and thence to the Government of the Argentine, as the agent of the United States in this transaction. The company proceeded to buy something like 13,900 tons of sugar on the assurance from our Government that the embargo was to be lifted by the Argentine Government. It turned out, however, that a misunderstanding had taken place in that regard; the Argentine Government did not then and there lift that embargo; and the American Trading Co., acting always as the agent of the United States, was unable to ship from the Argentine the sugar which it had purchased.

In the meantime, back here in the United States, the Department of Justice, very properly, I think, advertised far and wide that this great supply of sugar had been located in the Argentine, and that steps were being taken to bring it to the United States to break the domestic price. The newspapers were filled with this news; the Department of Justice very properly, I think, disseminated the information all over the country, with the result that shortly thereafter the price of sugar in the United States began going down hill, to the great relief of the American people; indeed, considerable relief was afforded to the American people by this campaign, even though not 1 pound of sugar had actually arrived in the United States. But the Argentine Government still stood in the way of the actual exportation of the sugar and the bringing of it to the United States. Sugar in the United States was going down hill; it went below the price that the Government had fixed to this concern, namely, 20 cents a pound for the sugar which was to be brought in. Finally, however, the Argentine Government, on the 23d of June, through its appropriate officials, issued this proclamation at Buenos Aires:

MINISTRY OF HACIENDA OF THE ARGENTINE NATION,
Buenos Aires, June 23, 1920.

Having seen the request of his excellency the ambassador of the United States of America regarding the necessary authorization for the American Trading Co., purchasing agent of the Department of Justice, to export 13,909 tons of sugar of national production; and considering that the Government is animated by the desire to fulfill satisfactorily the foregoing petition made direct by a sister nation, the executive power of the nation, in general agreement with the ministers, decrees:

ARTICLE 1. That the necessary permission be given to the American Trading Co., purchasing agent for the Department of Justice of the United States of America, to export to the said country 13,909 tons of sugar of national production.

ART. 2. That this be communicated, published, and filed.

IRIGOYEN.
D. E. SALABERRY.

That proclamation or order of the Argentine Government once more confirms the assertion and the contention that the United States Government had taken this matter up as an official proposition and named the American Trading Co. as its agent. It confirms also the contention that the Argentine Government regarded the American Trading Co. as nothing more nor less than the agent of the Government of the United States. But so long was the delay before this permission of the Argentine Government was obtained that the price of sugar in this country had fallen, as I said a moment ago, below the price fixed by our Government itself as applicable to the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. the distributors. When the price in the United States fell below the price fixed by the United States Government upon the American Trading Co. as the importer and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. as the distributors, the American Trading Co., seeing that it was hopelessly caught in this situation, although it was the agent of the Government and had done nothing except upon the request of the Government, asked our Government if they could not sell the sugar in the Argentine and get out of the whole transaction.

Now, I call the attention of the Senate to Exhibit No. 3, which is a letter written to Mr. Franklin, of the American Trading Co., under the date of August 2, 1920. It, too, is signed by Mr. Howard Figg, special assistant to the Attorney General. It reads as follows:

DEAR MR. FRANKLIN: I am in receipt of your communication of July 29 in regard to disposing of a certain portion of the 14,000 tons of Argentine sugar contracted for by the B. H. Howell Co., and in which the Department of Justice participated in distribution.

I may say that something like 5,000 tons of it had been brought to the United States prior to this time, leaving something like 9,000 tons still on the hands of these American citizens in the Argentine. Mr. Figg continues:

I am very sorry to inform you that under no circumstances could the Government concur in the thought even of allowing any portion of this sugar to be sold in the Argentine. You will find attached hereto paraphrase of cablegram received from Wiley, in charge of the embassy at Buenos Aires, which very definitely states the position of the Government in this transaction. But in spite of this I took the matter up with the State Department and found that Ambassador Stimpson, from Argentina, was here—

That is, the American ambassador to the Argentine happened to be in Washington at that time—

I arranged a conference with him, which took place Saturday, and I can not begin to make you understand how deeply he feels on this subject.

He also brought to my attention a matter of seeming interest to you, and that was that if any portion of this sugar was sold in the Argentine it would be ruination to the American Trading Co., or any other American interests that might be involved, as well as a very serious thing for the United States Government.

I had a talk with Mr. Linn, your representative here in Washington, this morning and I tried to make him understand the seriousness of this thought.

It is unnecessary to read the rest of the letter. That letter, however, is the evidence which shows, and it was fully supported in the hearings before the committee, that the United States Government, never releasing control of this transaction, or its agent, refused to permit these American citizens to sell this sugar in the Argentine, and thus escape from the inevitable financial loss which would attend bringing it to the United States under the agreement which they had with the Government; and so these people were left with the sugar on their hands. They brought it to this country. They brought it under a contract with this Government that it should be distributed to persons named by the Government, canners and other consumers of sugar. The Government had such a list of consumers. It was supplied to the B. H. Howell, Son & Co., the distributors of the sugar, but none of those consumers would take the sugar at the 20-cent price, because sugar had gone far below 20 cents; and these people, who were entirely innocent parties to this transaction, who had responded to the invitation of their own Government to perform a public service and help in smashing the price of sugar in the domestic market of the United States, find themselves facing, as they have faced for a year and a half or nearly two years, this tremendous loss.

The president of the Sugar Equalization Board was entirely familiar with this transaction, although that board had not taken any part in the campaign to reduce the price of sugar. The counsel of the board, Mr. Glasgow, as well as the president, appeared before the Agricultural Committee and told us of their entire familiarity with this whole transaction, their gratitude to Mr. Post, the president of B. H. Howell, Son & Co., and to the American Trading Co., for the services which they had rendered, and their earnest hope that the Congress of the United States would take some measure which would relieve these people of such a staggering loss, incurred by them through no fault of theirs, and incurred even in spite of their pleading that they be permitted to withdraw from the transaction at a time when they could have done so without loss—a transaction which they went into only at the Government's invitation, and from which the Government refused to let them withdraw, thereby compelling them to take a loss of something like $1,000,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, for my information, before the Senator sits down, why did the Government—as the Senator uses that term—refuse to let them withdraw from this contract or to sell their sugar in Argentina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I gather from the testimony, and also from this letter which is printed in the report, that this matter had become one involving the relations of the United States Government with the Government of the Republic of Argentina. The Republic of Argentina for months and months before this time had refused to permit any sugar of a certain grade—and that is the grade that was needed in this country—to be exported.

The Argentine Government and the Argentine people knew, of course, that the prices of sugar the world over, outside of the Argentine, were very high. They wanted to hold their own sugar there—they are a large sugar-producing country—so that the price of sugar to the people of the Argentine might be kept within reasonable bounds; but, as a favor to the Government of the United States, they said, "We will permit the exportation of a certain surplus. You," said they to the United States, "have asked this as a favor. You want it for certain purposes, to relieve your condition in the United States. All right; you can have it for that purpose." Now, when later on the condition in the United States had completely changed, and this long delay in getting the lifting of the embargo had transpired before the Argentine Government finally said "Yes" to the request of the United States Government, they then took the attitude—an attitude which they certainly must have related to the officials of the American Embassy in Buenos Aires—that they did not want the American Trading Co. to resell this sugar in the Argentine because the price of sugar in the Argentine had begun to go up, and they did not want any American citizen or anybody else to take advantage of that comity between nations which was illustrated by this entire transaction and make money in a speculative sense and at the expense of the Argentine people. The American ambassador to Buenos Aires had a thorough comprehension of the attitude of the Argentine Government in that respect, and he personally told the officials of the Department of Justice that it was unthinkable that the United States Government should request permission to resell the sugar in the Argentine; and the Department of Justice gave this information to these American citizens, and in effect forbade them to resell that sugar and thereby escape from the predicament in which they found themselves. In other words, they were compelled to bring it on to the United States in the face of a certain loss.

Senators may say that there is no legal authority back of the action of the Attorney General of the United States; that there was no legal authority about any of this campaign carried on to reduce the cost of living in the United States by the Department of Justice. That may be true. I do not assert that there is a legal authority, but I do assert that there is a high moral obligation on the part of the Government to grant these people relief in the way proposed by this joint resolution.

The United States Sugar Equalization Board is still in existence. It is authorized to carry on those transactions which were provided for in the original statute. The attorneys for the United States Sugar Equalization Board informed the Attorney General, when this predicament of the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. was brought to their attention, that the United States Sugar Equalization Board did not have authority to take over a transaction of this kind, as it was a peculiar kind not contemplated in the act which created the Sugar Equalization Board, and the Sugar Equalization Board themselves suggested that the only relief would be through the passage of an act of Congress authorizing the President of the United States to direct the Sugar Equalization Board to take over this transaction and liquidate it, take it off the hands of these citizens who find themselves in this predicament, who tried to escape, and had every legal right to escape, ordinarily speaking, but who were not permitted to escape. Hence this joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think that the facts in the case have been stated with substantial accuracy by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], making due allowance for such color as an advocate of a measure may usually be charged with; and the essential facts are not intricate nor involved. I am perfectly satisfied that if the Senate of the United States were apprised of the facts of this case and the significance of them by a fair presentation by both sides of the controversy, there could be no question about what the result would be. The trouble about it is that there are not more than a dozen Senators in the Chamber. I counted them just a moment ago; possibly one or two have come in since; but there are not to exceed 12 or 14 Senators in the Chamber now. I suggested the absence of a quorum before we began the discussion of this measure, and 49 Senators or thereabouts appeared, and immediately disappeared.

The Senator from New York has apprised the Senate that this joint resolution involves a matter of about $1,000,000. The fact about the matter is that the testimony taken in the hearings by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry discloses that the amount involved is not less than $1,800,000, and, if I understand the situation correctly, it amounts to more than $2,500,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Stanley
Bursum	Harris	Nicholson	Sterling
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Kendrick	Overman	Swanson
Curtis	Kenyon	Page	Trammell
Dial	Keyes	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Ladd	Shields	Warren
France	Lodge	Smith	Watson, Ga.
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Spencer	Willis

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. ELKINS, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. MOSES, Mr. SHEPPARD, and Mr. WADSWORTH answered to their names when called.

Mr. CALDER, Mr. CARAWAY, Mr. NELSON, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. KING, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. GLASS, Mr. ERNST, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. EDGE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, from the testimony of Mr. Armstrong, a representative of B. H. Howell Son & Co., given in the hearings at page 4, I read as follows:

> Through circumstances over which they had no control the transaction went astray as far as the commercial interests were involved. It accomplished the public purpose, and millions of dollars were saved to the American consumer by it, but through difficulties with the Argentine Government the sugar was not brought up as planned, and 9,000 tons of that sugar remain on hand unsold, involving a loss to these commercial interests of some $1,800,000.

That represents a loss, as will be perceived, of 2 cents per pound upon each pound of sugar. The witness testified that 9,000 tons remained unsold, but the joint resolution under consideration authorizes the Equalization Board to take over, not 9,000 tons but 13,902 tons of sugar, and if a similar loss is involved in the excess the total loss will be something over $2,700,000; so that the proposition before us is to reimburse B. H. Howell, Son & Co. to the extent of something over two and one-half million dollars on the transaction which is the subject of investigation.

I said that the essential facts are quite simple. In the spring or early summer of 1920 an arrangement was entered into between the then Attorney General and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. under which B. H. Howell, Son & Co. was to purchase in the Argentine Republic, as the agents and factors of the United States, sugar to the amount of about 70,000 tons.

That sugar was brought to the United States and there turned over to the distributors designated by the Department of Justice and sold to the consuming public at such a figure as would cover the actual cost of the sugar and 1 cent more per pound, that 1 cent to go to B. H. Howell, Son & Co. as their commission and compensation for services to be rendered by them.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that B. H. Howell, Son & Co. risked not one dollar in the transaction. They claim to have been acting simply as purchasing agents for the United States. However, the United States having no money for the purpose of carrying on a transaction of that character, B. H. Howell, Son & Co. were obliged to advance the necessary money, this to be reimbursed to them by the Government of the United States when the sugar should be sold at an advance or, as transpires, if sold at a loss, by an appropriation to be made by the Congress, as it is proposed now shall be made.

I wish to assume the most perfect good faith in this matter upon the part of B. H. Howell, Son & Co. They represent that they were importuned to go into this transaction by the Attorney General; that, in the first place, they were averse to taking it up, but, yielding to the solicitation thus emanating from the head of this great Department of Justice, they undertook the commission as desired by him.

Mr. President, I am asked to yield to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], which I gladly do.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House excused Mr. CANNON from service on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, and that the Speaker of the House appointed Mr. ANTHONY to fill the vacancy.

The message also announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 9237, the first deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1922.

The message further announced that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 15, 17, 29, and 30, to House bill 9237, and agreed to the same; that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 25, 26, and 27, and concurred therein with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 39) providing for the correction of an error in the enrollment of House bill 9237, the first deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1922, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the conference report on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report, which will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9237) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments of the Senate numbered 15, 17, 25, 26, 27, 29, and 30.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
CARTER GLASS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. Under the pressure of the passage of this bill I was compelled to overlook a point which I shall raise at some other time in connection with another bill. I move the adoption of the conference report, and following that I have another motion to make.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish for a few moments to discuss the conference report, but obviously I can not interfere with the address of the Senator from Montana. I have no disposition to delay the report, appreciating its importance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] stated that he desired to be here if the conference report was called up, and I ask the Senator from Wyoming to defer consideration for a moment until I can send for that Senator.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator mentions 4.30 or 5 o'clock. Of course, if the Senator wishes to take the responsibility, he may do so. However, the bill must be enrolled and go to the President in time to become a law to-day, or we are in the default which I stated yesterday. We must pay the trainees in the vocational educational institutions, who will be unpaid to-morrow, because to-morrow is pay day. Therefore I hope there may be no delay.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I supposed I had the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Montana yield while I ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish to ask whether that provision which the Senator inserted regarding $100,000 for the unemployment emergency in connection with the Department of Labor was left in or stricken out?

Mr. WARREN. It was stricken out. We were unable to hold it. I will say to the Senator, without divulging any secret, that that and the one in which the Senator from Arizona is particularly interested went out. We were unable to maintain them.

Mr. SPENCER. I recognize so clearly the emergency for the passage of the bill from the standpoint of the injured ex-service men that I have nothing more to say about it at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Wyoming for the purpose of presenting the conference report and, of course, under the circumstances, I shall be glad to yield for the consideration of it if the debate is not protracted.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, conference reports are always in order, but I understand we can not proceed with it if the Senator does not wish to have us proceed and if the Senator does not wish to yield a sufficient time to his colleague to address the Senate at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no objection if the matter can be disposed of with reasonable promptness.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Montana yield further so that the Senator from Arizona may occupy the floor as he desires?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am glad to do so.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Montana for yielding to me at this juncture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps the Chair ought to say that the Chair asked unanimous consent of the Senate that the conference report might be laid before the Senate at this time. There was no objection, and the report is therefore before the Senate for consideration. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. ASHURST. I appreciate that the conference report must be adopted, and adopted soon. I should say that within an hour the enrollment of the bill should begin. My first duty is to thank the conferees on the part of the Senate, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. So far as I am advised, they faithfully attempted to carry out in conference the expressed will of the Senate. For that, as faithful servants, they have not only my thanks but the thanks of the country as well.

Mr. President, when this conference report is adopted what do we find has been done, amongst other things? In the first place, the conference on unemployment called by the President, which convened last October, recommended an appropriation of $400,000 to assist in procuring employment for the unemployed. The Budget Commission reduced the amount to $200,000, and the Senate incorporated an amendment into the bill appropriating not what the conference asked, not what the Budget Commission asked, but $100,000; a very necessary appropriation in these times, with so many men out of employment and winter coming on. The Senate acted wisely. If there was any unwisdom about its action, it was in reducing the amount to so small a sum as $100,000; but the Senate acted with the best lights before it and did a substantial service to the country by appropriating $100,000.

I shall not take time now to go over the ground I traversed on last Monday. The Senate will remember that I presented a status of affairs which I believe convinced every Senator of the necessity for immediate action regarding the hospitalization of tubercular soldiers. The Senate adopted my amendment which appropriated $1,000,000 to be spent by the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau or in such other manner as the executive branch might see fit, for the hospitalization of tubercular soldiers who were gathering in large numbers throughout the Southwest, attracted there, as I said, by the widespread opinion, shared not only in the West but throughout all portions of our country, that in the Southwest a specific, the healing air, could be found for their great plague, tuberculosis.

The Senate was convinced that a real necessity existed.

I did not happen to have in my pocket or amongst my papers on Monday, when I made my speech on this subject, a telegram which I shall now read. This is the telegram from Dr. Sweek, of Arizona, of the Public Health Service:

> Exact figures impossible. Lowest estimates 950 active cases vicinity of Phoenix. Four hundred should be hospitalized but not willing to enter present contract hospital. Number of cases in Arizona that would enter properly conducted hospital, lowest estimate, 1,500. Present number hospitalized here, 104. Any size institution up to 1,500 would be full nine months of year. Hospital for 400 could be kept full year round for 25 years. Attending specialists available. Expensive resident staff of full time men unnecessary. Would like opportunity to make this model hospital. Great need for hospital here, as men come from all States. Proper care here would prevent widespread criticism. As disease advances the number here increases as Southwest is used as last resort.

Now, that telegram means that 1,500 men could be hospitalized; it means that 104 are being hospitalized. As I said Monday, the opinion is widespread throughout the United States that the Southwest is a specific, a healing balm for soldiers and other persons afflicted with tuberculosis. I went on to point out patients from all over the world gather in the Southwest, and that while it is true that there are vacant beds in hospitals throughout the United States in other States, yet because there are vacant beds in various hospitals the authorities decline, it seems, to set up a hospital in Phoenix, and they say to the soldier, "Go where we say you must go."

Now, Mr. President, I submit that in time of war it is right for the superior officer to say where a soldier shall go, whether it costs the soldier's life or not, but after he has gone faithfully through the war, after he has had practically every segment of his lungs burned and torn away by the enemy's gas, it is not humanitarian, it is not just to him to say, "You shall go where we say or you shall die." A humanitarian Government, a just Government will say to him, "If you share the common belief that your plague will be lifted and your disease arrested in some particular climate and you have gone there in large numbers, in good faith, at your own expense, in that belief, then a rich and opulent Government will set up a hospital there for you."

I repeat the Senate conferees are entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the manly way in which they struggled to save this amendment appropriating the $1,000,000, and if a thousand ex-soldiers die from neglect, abandoned by the most powerful and opulent Government, the blame will not rest upon the Senate, but will rest upon those who are so bound by red tape that they are no longer free men.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, as I recall reading the conference report as published in the RECORD of yesterday, the Senate conferees have agreed to strike out the item of $100,000 for the Labor Employment Bureau. I regret very much that such action has been taken. I heard the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] discussing the matter as I entered the Chamber. In this country to-day a very great many people are out of employment, I believe fully as many as two or three months ago, despite the reports of some of the departments of the Government to the effect that employment of labor is increasing.

This appropriation was asked for by the conference appointed by the President, which held prolonged meetings in this city during the fall. It was earnestly urged by the Department of Labor. The sum of $400,000 was asked for by the conference appointed by the President, and $200,000 was urged by the Dawes Commission, but the Senate appropriated only $100,000. Now, even this amount has been stricken from the bill.

At a time like this, Mr. President, when there are so many men and women who need work, the Government could perform splendid service in extending the operations of the employment bureau. It seems too bad that the Senate conferees did not bring this item back in disagreement and permit the Senate to insist upon their previous action. I believe that if the conferees had done that the House would have been constrained to agree.

I hesitate to criticize the Senate conferees; I know how interested they are in seeing to it that provisions which are voted into a bill are finally carried toward enactment; but it seems to me that in this instance it is to be regretted very much, indeed, that the appropriation of $100,000 provided for in the Senate has been eliminated.

I repeat, Mr. President, that there are millions of men and women who are to-day walking the streets, and we have stricken from this deficiency appropriation bill the one item which might in some manner have helped to reduce that amount of unemployment.

In the State of New York, where the Federal Labor Board acts with the State board, I know they have done excellent service. I know of no bureau of the Government that has done more in its efforts to help in the present most unfortunate labor situation. I repeat, I regret very much, indeed, that the conferees on the part of the Senate have agreed that the amendment shall go out of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber, attending a meeting of the Joint Committee on Agricultural Inquiry, when the conference report on the deficiency bill was brought before the Senate for consideration. I am informed that amendments numbered 21 and 22, authorizing an appropriation of $100,000 for the use of the employment service, which were adopted by the Senate after a hearing in the matter by the Senate committee, have been stricken from the bill. The so-called unemployment conference, which was convened by the President in this city a few weeks ago in order to secure advice as to the best means of relieving unemployment throughout the country, as one of its major recommendations suggested that an additional sum of $400,000, in the nature of an emergency appropriation, be made for the use of the employment service in the Bureau of Labor. If my information is correct, the budget embraced $200,000 for that purpose. Notwithstanding the item in the budget for $200,000, the Senate committee incorporated only $100,000. It now seems that that $100,000 is to go out, and that no additional sum is to be made available for meeting the requirements of the employment service.

The necessity that this urgent deficiency appropriation bill shall pass very soon seems to me to be very great, and upon a consideration of the matter, without having had an opportunity to confer with others who have expressed an interest in the subject, I would not feel justified in asking that the Senate reject the conference report in order to secure the further consideration by the conferees of these amendments. So far as I know, that is the only way by which it could be accomplished.

I do not know what value should be attached to the recommendation of the unemployment conference. There has been some diminution in unemployment since that conference concluded its labors. The extent to which unemployment has decreased, however, is, I believe, very slight, and it is certain that if the Employment Service in the Department of Labor is to accomplish any substantial benefit, particularly under conditions as they now exist, it must be accorded more liberal appropriations.

There is a difference existing in the minds of legislators as to whether the Employment Service ought to be perpetuated. I think my colleagues already know my attitude upon the subject. I have felt that there is great need for an active, well-organized, and efficient employment service. The time is approaching, if it has not arrived, when the Congress ought to determine the question whether it is advisable to maintain a Federal employment service. There is no doubt in my own mind as to the correct conclusion respecting that question. I feel that the conferees on the part of the Senate might have given the Senate an opportunity further to express itself upon this subject before eliminating the appropriation which was inserted in the bill by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator's interest in this particular subject is well known. I have recognized it, as he knows, many times in the past, and he, among others, was in my mind in the struggle we made last night to retain in the bill the $100,000 item to which he refers.

I observed when I examined the testimony taken before the House committee, when it was considering this subject, what I thought was a reluctance on their part to entertain suggestions along this particular line. Nevertheless, the Senate committee invited testimony, not only from the Labor Department officials in charge but from representatives of the conference which was appointed on the invitation of the President of the United States. We had before the Senate Committee on Appropriations from that conference two witnesses who were well versed in the subject, who were very interesting, and from whom we obtained much information. We came to the conclusion that it was best at least to try an appropriation of $100,000, and so such an item was put in the bill. That and one other item which I have mentioned were the last upon which late last night we were unable to agree. The bill, as the Senator knows—and I dislike to make these explanations—is under stress. In order to become a law it must be signed to-day by the President, or else we shall to-morrow be in default several million dollars needed to provide for the disabled soldiers.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to add that, in addition to having taken before the Committee on Appropriations the testimony to which he refers, the conferees of the Senate last night reread the testimony to the conferees on the part of the other body and insisted upon their agreeing to the Senate amendment, but they would not do so.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas, who is a distinguished Member of this body, of long experience here as well as in another body, that knowing the exigencies of the position, and politics, and all of that, I am always inclined, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to say to every Senator that if he can do himself any credit by abusing the conferees I have not any objection. But the Senator from Arkansas does not want to do that, I know; and I wish to say to him, in renewing the thread of my remarks, that we were compelled either to let it go or to come back with a disagreement and pass by the date when this bill ought to pass.

That is all I can say.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not know just what the Senator from Wyoming means by one of the remarks he has just made. I have not abused the conferees, and I had no purpose to do so.

Mr. WARREN. And I did not accuse the Senator of so doing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. The only thing that makes it seem pertinent that the conferees might be criticized in connection with their very prompt relinquishment of this item is the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, which might be construed by those who heard it as implying that they ought to be criticized, since no one, as far as I know, has attempted to criticize them.

Mr. President, it is true that the body at the other end of the Capitol on another occasion, when this body had inserted an appropriation of $250,000 for the regular service of the Labor Department in connection with unemployment, repudiated the proposal, and that when the conference report was brought before the Senate, I, with others, asked that the Senate disagree to it and that the bill be sent back to conference, and as a result of that action the body at the other end of the Capitol yielded, and there was very promptly incorporated in the bill, as soon as the House had a chance to vote upon it, the item of $250,000 which the Senate had first asked for.

I have no disposition whatever to criticize anybody in connection with this matter. I think it is exceedingly regrettable that the President's unemployment conference should have accomplished so little in connection with the Employment Service of the Department of Labor, in view of its recommendation that $400,000 be appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I do not wish, of course, to criticize the conferees for the omission of this item, but I do feel that it is a very serious mistake.

We are facing to-day in this country the most critical condition of unemployment which has ever existed in its history. Some little time ago I had occasion to refer to the unemployment of 1914, particularly during the months of February and March, the months when unemployment in this country normally reaches its maximum. The unemployment condition then was not comparable to the unemployment condition which existed in this country during the months of September and October, months when unemployment normally is at its minimum. An unemployment during the months of September and October of from 4,000,000 to 6,000,000 men presages, unless drastic measures of relief are applied, that next February and March we shall be facing in this country a most deplorable situation, and one which may shake the Republic to its foundations.

For my own part, I have been waiting patiently for a complete reversal of the policies of the last administration, but I must confess that my patience is nearly exhausted, and, for my own part, I believe we have now reached the time when we must reverse the policies inaugurated by the last administration or go upon the rocks.

I have looked with amazement at the RECORD containing the remarks of some of the Members upon the other side of the Chamber upon the situation—industrial, financial, and commercial—which confronts the country. I have been astonished to find that they seem not at all to realize that the condition in which we find ourselves is the result of the policies, not of this administration but of the last one, policies which, I regret to say, have not as yet been completely abandoned. I believe these policies will be changed; I hope they will be changed very shortly; but I am convinced that before very long they must be changed in response to an insistent demand from the American people, the people on our farms, where the corncribs and granaries are bursting with grain, while, as I said the other day, the owners of that grain are asking whether a system be rational and valid under which the American farmer can not sell his products while millions in Europe, in countries which are fundamentally solvent, are compelled to starve for the lack of those very materials which the farmer can not sell. The same thing is true of our cotton growers in the South, while the banks of the West and South are filled with frozen assets based upon these commodities which can not be moved, and which prevent the liquidation of those assets until they are moved.

I left this country in the spring to make some observations in Europe. Long before I left I had predicted that we were running into a serious condition of unemployment. When I left there were hundreds of thousands out of employment. When I came back there were millions out of employment. The owners of the huge steel furnaces were drawing their fires; the important factories were closing down; the great industries were marking time; and yet I found in Europe a market great enough to absorb everything which we had, or everything which we could make for a long period to come, if all of our industries were running full time. There is something radically wrong.

This condition of unemployment is a serious and a tragic one, and we are denied, by the obstinacy of some members of this conference committee in the House, a paltry $100,000 to find relief for 4,000,000 of unemployed men, who are suffering not through fault of their own, not because of the consequences of war, but because of the stupidity of our governmental policy. There is no fundamental reason why there should be unemployment and financial, industrial, and commercial depression in the United States.

They tell us, "This was to be expected; it is the natural reaction from war." That is very true; but picture the Army surgeon rising from his tent in the morning and going out into the early light and finding a soldier wounded upon the crimson snow, stained by his fast-ebbing blood, and saying, "It is very sad, but it is the consequence of war," and think of that surgeon refusing to save the wounded soldier by ligaturing his bleeding arteries and closing his wounds! That is the condition which we are in to-day. We need surgery to avert a calamity which is not far away; and yet, for even a study of the condition of unemployment, we are denied by the obstinacy of the House conferees a paltry $100,000.

What excuse will you make to the workers in all the States when you are placed upon the defensive in the next campaign? I can make none, and will make none, except to point to my record as condemning in unequivocal terms the yielding upon this matter; not condemning the conferees—I do not do that, because I believe that they conscientiously tried to retain this amendment—but condemning the fact that there had to be yielding, as it seems, under the circumstances. It seems to be the case that in our legislation those who are in the right recede and those who are in the wrong succeed.

In ordinary times, with the great Republic in a condition of health, with its great resisting and restorative power unimpaired, that policy might do; but we are in an extraordinary time, when measures of relief must be had, and when, if they are not had, disaster can be the only result.

For my own part, I feel so deeply about this matter that I feel that it is time for us to make a stand upon all questions which involve the restoration of the country, the reemployment of its unemployment, and the rehabilitation of the southern and western farmers, upon whom the prosperity of the country ultimately depends; and, for myself, I want to say that from this time on I propose to wage a vigorous fight for the measures which seem to me to be measures of relief, not because I wish to resist those who have had much more experience in legislative affairs than I, but because, in the critical condition in which we find ourselves, I believe that it is the duty of every man to exercise his judgment as best he may, and to stand by the conclusions which he is compelled to reach after having studied the situation confronting him.

I hope that in some way it may be possible to keep this item in the bill; and I express that hope for the reason that I believe there will be serious criticism of the House and of the Senate if this most important appropriation is allowed to go out of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not think there is anything in the subject immediately under consideration or in the remarks that I made a few minutes ago calculated to provoke the outburst which the Senate has just heard on the part of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] respecting the policies of a former administration. To my mind, this is not a political question; and the Senator from Maryland, however much he may be disposed to do so, can not and shall not throw upon a former administration the responsibility for the failure of the present administration to give reasonable or adequate support to the unemployment service of the Department of Labor.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. I merely wish to say to the Senator—my very good friend, although we differ in politics—that I was not referring to any remarks which the Senator himself had made in connection with the pending measure. I was referring to some of the statements which had been made in times past, and was not in any way referring to the Senator himself. Otherwise, his criticism of what might have seemed to be an attack upon what he said would be perfectly proper. I merely wish the RECORD to show that I was not referring to his remarks in connection with this measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I repeat my former statement, that there is nothing in the issue now under consideration, or in anything else which has occurred here, which justifies the injection of politics into this controversy. The former administration can not be held responsible, in my opinion, for the unemployment which exists now. Neither do I assert that the present administration is fairly to be held responsible for unemployment. This condition is the result of far-reaching economic and industrial influences which can not always be controlled by political action, however wise, and it is that thought which prompts me at this time to resent the effort upon the part of my friend the Senator from Maryland to in some mysterious manner hold the former administration responsible for the conditions of unemployment which now exist.

We on this side think that the Senator, and all those who pursued the course in so long delaying the disposition of the treaty of peace and consequently the return of world peace, has contributed not a little to the conditions which now exist in the United States, and indeed throughout the world, with reference to unemployment.

I have no disposition to take issue with the Senator from Maryland respecting the terrible arraignment he has made of the present administration, when he has characterized its governmental policies as "stupid beyond description." I myself have no disposition to inject at this time into the Senate a consideration of that subject.

Three years and more have come and gone since the party with which the Senator from Maryland is associated assumed control in both branches of Congress, with an overwhelming majority, and when he denounces the governmental policies of the United States respecting unemployment and commercial and industrial conditions as "stupid beyond description," he characterizes in his own chosen way the policies of the present and not a former administration.

I well understand that there is in his remarks the implied declaration that all the woe and misery which has come to curse mankind during recent years is in some mysterious and unexplainable manner the result of Democratic policies and administrations. It is regrettable to me that at a time when thousands of men who, at the demand of their country, entered its military service and abandoned their positions of profitable employment, fought valiantly, and, returning home at the close of the war, found their places filled by others and themselves unable to secure employment; at a time when thousands of ex-soldiers are walking about the streets of the great cities pleading for an opportunity to earn a living by toil; at a time when there is great need for an efficient employment service—a policy should be pursued of so stinting the unemployment service as to render that service incapable of proving whether it can meet the requirements of the existing situation and bring idle men into profitable labor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will let us finish the consideration of this conference report. It provides for some of the disabled men the Senator is speaking of, and I assume he is in sympathy with this action.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that well. Within 48 hours I have seen men, wearing dirty and ragged fragments of uniforms, soliciting aid in the city of Washington, and when asked why they did not go to work I have heard the reply, "Give me the opportunity, and I will work at anything."

Great men of the Nation, at least men whom the President considered great, convened in a conference for the purpose of considering the subject, said that the Federal Government could do its part toward relieving unemployment by making a liberal appropriation available for the service in the Department of Labor, and now the Congress, by agreeing to this conference report, refuses to grant a dollar. The responsibility must rest upon the Congress and not upon the body at the other end of the Capitol alone.

The Senator from Maryland, and other Senators, can not acquit themselves for the failure to discharge their duty in connection with this important subject by saying that the House of Representatives, in a brief hour or two of conference, through its conferees, refused to agree to this item. The subject is far more important than appears on the face of the item, or upon the face of the action taken by the conference committee. Millions of men in the United States are out of employment. Years ago, in a "former administration," this Government adopted the policy of creating a Federal agency to relieve, in part, those conditions as they arose, and now, while the Bureau of Employment in the Department of Labor is operating under an appropriation so small in amount that it has been compelled to confine its activities to a few congested centers, and has not been given an opportunity of demonstrating whether a Federal employment service is really of great value, it is denied an allowance of a single dollar to meet an emergency which even Gen. Dawes, the head of the budget, recognized by recommending the appropriation of $200,000; but the responsibility is on the Congress and not on the House of Representatives alone. It takes action by both bodies of Congress to pass a measure or to make an item law.

It is about time the Senate was serving notice on the body at the other end of the Capitol that when an amendment is incorporated in an appropriation bill by a vote of the Senate that amendment must be considered by the conference. One House has no right to make and enforce a rule which precludes the conferees from considering items adopted by the other House. The conferees on the part of the Senate ought either to make their position as to that clear, or they ought to require the conferees on the part of the body at the other end of the Capitol to take these disputed items back to their House and have a vote on them. If a vote had been had on this item in the House of Representatives, as occurred two years ago, it probably would have been overwhelmingly agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 14.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 15, 17, 29, and 30 to the bill H. R. 9237, the first deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1922, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 25, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment, insert "$175,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 26, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment, insert "$3,774,482.66."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 27, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment, insert "$6,750,734.08."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I can not allow this to go by without making a very brief statement, and I ask my fellow Senators to suffer me to do so.

The conferees of Senate and House agreed last night in full and signed in blank the conference report, and the blank form as usual stated that a full and free conference had been had. For reasons which I shall endeavor to explain, and which I presume were the real reasons, the House conferees insisted that the clerks draw up a report, which went through the Appropriations Committee to the House some time last evening, showing certain disagreements on certain items in the bill. That was, in fact, incorrect and misleading.

Now, to go back a little, after the budget bill passed the House proceeded to have all the appropriations come from one committee, in which they were right, undoubtedly. Then the House adopted a rule which I am generous enough to think they adopted for the purpose of governing their own body rather than insisting upon governing ours, but, as a matter of fact, a rule providing that anything put in a bill by any Member anywhere contrary to the rules of the House should not be permitted to go to a committee of conference with power to effect settlement, but the House as a whole should withhold the power of "full and free conference" from its conferees.

In the last Congress when the first bill after the adoption of that rule came over here, with a hundred or more differences, 75 of them perhaps claimed to be obnoxious to their new House rule, we on this side of the Capitol were in a hurry, as usual at the close of the session, and so they asked us to go in as if we could agree upon everything, after which they would go back and insist upon the House agreeing to various Senate items that might be obnoxious to their new rule, and then come back and confer together.

Now we are in this position: We depend now for estimates upon the budget. The President of the United States sends to us and to the House the estimates. The House committee so far, while paying attention, it is true, in a large way to those estimates, yet have cut them ad libitum where they like; and when the bills come to us we naturally presume that we have the right, under the laws and estimates and under laws which we believe have existed for years, because we have been appropriating under them for years, to proceed as heretofore. We are then met by the assurance on the part of the House conferees that they are with us and would like to agree with us, but, unfortunately, they have first to go back to the House for its action, notwithstanding the fact that we are under orders to have a "full and free conference."

I have in my hand the original conference report on the measure upon which we have just acted. It may have been observed that I did not send it to the desk, but have asked action entirely upon the House report. This report which I hold in my hand is signed by WARREN, CURTIS, and GLASS, and it reads that we have entered into a full and free conference, and this is the report. We signed it with the understanding that it was a full and free conference. Now we are met with this condition of things as it comes over from the House. I can understand that they probably should take credit in this case for whipping the devil around the stump so as to get the bill through to-day; but I wish to give the Senate notice, and I wish in this way to give the House notice, that if I have any influence over the Committee on Appropriations I shall never again go into a conference and sign a report beforehand which states that it is a full and free conference and have it directly untrue on its face, as it is reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning and in the message on which we have just acted. That is all I have to say about the matter now.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word supplementing what the chairman of the committee has said. I wish it very distinctly understood that I shall refuse to serve as a conferee hereafter if my name is to be attached to a report which is not a true report. I was amazed to find my name attached in the printed RECORD to a report which reads in the last paragraph that the committee of conference have not agreed upon certain specified amendments. As a matter of fact, the committee of conference agreed upon every amendment.

Mr. WARREN. And this report is made under protest and simply to keep the record straight.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to have it distinctly understood that my name shall not be attached hereafter to a report that is not a full and free conference report, and that does not appear in the RECORD as we agreed upon it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is right about that.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming with reference to the item of appropriation for the reduction of tuberculosis in cattle. What happened to that?

Mr. WARREN. Last night it was agreed to, but this morning I find it was disagreed to. However, the House in the meantime has voted upon it and it is agreed to in the sum of $600,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolution (H. Con. Res. 39) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 9237, the first deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1922, the Clerk be authorized and directed to strike out "present session," on page 17, line 24, of the engrossed bill and insert in lieu thereof "first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

Mr. WARREN. The resolution involves a matter of form merely. The bill contained the words "present session," it having been considered and passed by the other House during the last session, but we are now in another session and it becomes necessary to make the change as proposed in the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the resolution of the House.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. WARREN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I did not intend to take up so much of his time.

DISPOSITION OF SUGAR IMPORTED FROM ARGENTINA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, reminding the Senate of the very eloquent arraignment of the Congress of the United States for declining to make an appropriation of the relatively small sum of $100,000 in order to enable the Department of Labor to cope with the problem of unemployment, I repeat that we are now asked to vote a subsidy, a gratuity, of more than $2,500,000 to B. H. Howell, Son & Co., a sum twenty-five times greater than the amount which has given rise to the discussion which has just taken place.

Mr. President, I desire to assume that B. H. Howell, Son & Co. in the transaction under investigation were actuated by perfectly praiseworthy motives and acted in entire good faith, but I do not recognize, as has been asserted, that there is any high moral obligation devolving upon us in this matter, nor any moral obligation whatever. I am not basing my opposition to the joint resolution upon the view that there is no legal liability upon the part of the United States. If I recognized that there were a moral obligation of any kind whatever, I should not be opposing its speedy passage.

The question presented is simply this: When the head of a department goes entirely outside of the authority conferred upon him by law and undertakes to obligate the United States, is Congress under any moral obligation to take up the contract which he has thus made without any authority in the law at all? If that principle be admitted, Mr. President—and that is the principle upon which this joint resolution is founded—we might as well repeal all statutes imposing any restrictions whatever upon the power of the heads of departments so far as obligating the Government of the United States is concerned and let them "go to it."

Mr. President, it is said that during the war time, when it became necessary to act promptly without a moment's delay, authority was assumed by the heads of departments, and Congress afterwards ratified and confirmed their action by appropriate legislation. If this transaction had occurred in war time, I might be disposed to regard it with a less critical eye, but, make no mistake whatever, the transactions under investigation occurred in the summer of the year 1920, more than 18 months after the armistice had been signed, and when there was no exigency such as confronted the officers of the Government in the executive branch in the midst of the perplexing problems incident to the waging of the war.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], advocating the enactment of this legislation, very candidly has stated that the transaction was without any authority whatever in the law.

That is quite right. In that respect, however, he differs from the Attorney General, who, testifying before the Committee on Agriculture, said:

Under the Lever Act the President was empowered to use any agencies that he might see fit to purchase supplies of necessaries of this kind, especially sugar; and the Department of Justice and the Department of State, which were acting, after all, for the Executive, were simply within their rights and performed their duties, as I see it, in arranging for the purchase of this sugar.

I shall presently show, Mr. President, that there is no foundation for that statement. The law is perfectly plain and perfectly clear, and it confers no authority whatever upon any officer to purchase this sugar or any sugar under the circumstances here detailed.

Of course, Mr. President, if there were authority in the law this legislation would never be presented to the Senate for its consideration at all, because if there were a perfectly legal contract with B. H. Howell, Son & Co., and satisfaction was not promptly made for anything that was due to them under the contract, the Court of Claims is open to them, and they could go there and sue the Government of the United States without depending upon this legislation. They need this legislation because there was no authority for the making of a contract. The situation, Mr. President, is this: The only law to which any appeal can be made at all is what is known as the Lever Act, referred to in the extract from the testimony of the Attorney General to which I have just called the attention of the Senate. The Lever Act authorized the President of the United States to do a great many things, and the President of the United States delegated the authority conferred upon him by that act to the food controller.

When this matter was under consideration by the Senate some time ago, before I had given it the attention which I have bestowed upon it since, I said that if any officer of the Government were authorized by any law to make such a contract as it is alleged was entered into in this case it was the food controller and not the Attorney General, and that the Attorney General acted without the semblance of authority.

My attention has since been called, however, to the fact that prior to the time that these transactions arose, by Executive order, the powers of the former food controller were reposed in the Attorney General. So that whatever authority the food controller had under the Lever Act, the Attorney General was entitled to exercise at the time of these transactions; but not only is there no express authority conferred upon the President or upon the food controller or anyone else by the Lever Act to purchase sugar, but it is impliedly denied to him by the provisions of section 11, to which I shall invite the attention of the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I am interested in the point the Senator is now discussing in regard to the authority to act under the Lever Act, but it is true, is it not, that there was a corporation formed in Delaware, known as the Sugar Equalization Board, through which the President did in fact purchase sugar and from the operations of which there was accumulated a vast sum of money in profits which were returned to the Treasury? Is not that the agency to which the Attorney General doubtless made reference?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; that is impossible. The so-called Sugar Equalization Board was created by the President as one of the agencies for the purpose of carrying out such power as was given to him under the act in question. I have not before me the order of the President creating the Sugar Equalization Board. I have, however, before me the act under which that board was created and under which it was entitled to exercise whatever power the President had in the premises, and I am inviting the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President had no such powers, and therefore could not confer those powers either upon the equalization board or on any other agency.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the Senator attempt to make the point and justify the statement that the President had no authority during the war under any specific act to purchase food products?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No, sir; I am just going to invite attention to the fact that he had authority to purchase certain food products not including sugar. Section 11 of the Lever Act reads as follows:

That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash at reasonable prices wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of this act, then the price paid for any such articles so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

So, Mr. President, having enumerated these particular articles of food which the President was authorized to buy and to sell, as a matter of course every other food article is necessarily excluded. In other words, not only is there in the act no express authority to the President to buy sugar, but by the fact that certain articles are specified which he is entitled to buy he is, therefore, forbidden to spend a dollar of the public money in the purchase of sugar.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion to the Senator, if he will yield for a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. McNARY. The President under some authority of law, although I have not before me the particular act, constituted the Sugar Equalization Board, which did operate and function, which acquired the Cuban sugar crop of 1919, put a price on it, sold it to the public, and realized a great profit, which was turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly, but I have not felt called upon to inquire upon what pretended authority the Cuban sugar crops of 1917–18 and 1918–19 were acquired. That was in the midst of hostilities. That, to my mind, furnishes no basis whatever for the claim that, 18 months after the armistice was signed, the President had any authority, unless somebody can point to some provision of the law conferring it upon him.

Mr. McNARY. Is it not true—I have not the law before me and am speaking only from memory—that the Lever Act itself did not terminate until a proclamation was issued by the President that a state of peace existed with Germany?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. That is what I am saying, that at the time in question the only authority of law was the Lever Act, which expressly excluded sugar from its operations.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator if it is not true that after the Sugar Equalization Board was created its authority was extended for practically the same period as stated in the Lever Act?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The authority of the Sugar Equalization Board was extended by virtue of an act passed October 18, 1920, generally known as the McNary Act, all of these transactions having occurred prior to that time.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that; but, still, the Sugar Equalization Board was a functioning organism of the Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Under the Lever Act, authorized to do the things which the Lever Act authorized the President to do.

Mr. McNARY. I am asking the Senator if it is not a fact that after the Sugar Equalization Board was created the President did acquire, through it, the crop of sugar I have mentioned?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator means the Cuban sugar crop of 1917–18?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; and disposed of it to the American public at a profit?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know; I have not investigated by what claim of authority it was exercised; but I am perfectly willing to say that they believed they had the right under the Lever Act to do it. I do not care anything about that. It is perfectly plain that they did not have the authority under the Lever Act to do it.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator pardon me for just a moment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. I hesitate to interfere with the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; that is all right. I hope we may get some enlightenment.

Mr. McNARY. I have a reference to the testimony of the Attorney General, though I am not able to place my finger on it at this moment, where he in fact said that the President was acting by virtue of the Lever Act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have it. I read it a moment ago.

Mr. McNARY. I want to say that there is a difference of opinion between the two great lawyers on that subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Here is the testimony of the Attorney General:

Under the Lever Act the President was empowered to use any agencies that he might see fit to purchase supplies of necessaries of this kind, especially sugar.

And I am calling your attention to the fact that there was not any expression of sugar in the act, but that, on the contrary, sugar was excluded from the things which he was permitted to purchase.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator understands, I assume, that there is no contention on the part of the supporters of this measure that the United States Government purchased this sugar in the Argentine.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If they did not, I do not know where their liability comes in at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The contention is rather that the United States Government used as an agency these two concerns which I have mentioned before for the purchase of the sugar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. The United States purchased through these people as its agents.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It named them as the agents of the United States Government in its negotiations with the Argentine Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and the United States Government, of course, if it goes down there, must act through certain agents, and it utilized these people as agents.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The United States Government, of course, did not put up any of the money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; Howell & Co. put it up.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Howell & Co. put it up, and they did the actual purchasing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator would not contend, would he, that the Department of Justice had no right to use an agency in that way?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Department of Justice had a right to use any agency they saw fit to carry out such powers as were given to them by the act. There is not any doubt about that. That is to say, if the Department of Justice had the power to buy the sugar, they undoubtedly would have the right to employ Howell & Co. to do the actual purchasing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator knows that I have not contended that the Department of Justice had the right to use the public funds in the purchase of sugar. I do contend, however, that it had the right to enter into voluntary agreements with citizens by which this sugar should be purchased by citizens, brought to the United States, and sold and distributed at a price and in a manner fixed by the Government; and that is what was done.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Wherein is the difference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a very great difference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not the slightest. The thing comes down eventually to the proposition that the Government of the United States is called upon to make up the loss because Howell & Co. were not carrying out a transaction upon their own account and in their own interest, but that they were merely acting as agents for the Government of the United States. That is the basis of the claim, is it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is not quite an accurate description of it, in my view. This matter comes before us because the Government declined to release these people from this undertaking——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is another matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And they were still faithful to their Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is another feature of it, to which I shall advert presently—the alleged interposition of the Government of the United States, preventing Howell & Co. from disposing of this sugar in the Argentine. That is another matter; but the transaction is that Howell & Co. were employed by the Government of the United States to buy the sugar, bring it to the United States, and turn it over to the Government of the United States, acting as agents for the Government; and, of course, any money that they advanced the Government of the United States stood obligated to return to them, either out of the Treasury of the United States or from the money received from the avails of the sugar sold. There is not any controversy about that, and can not be.

Mr. President, I have demonstrated, as I think, with perfect clarity that there was no such authority in the Attorney General or any other officer of the United States; but what does that mean? That means that by no possibility can there arise any moral obligation upon the Government of the United States. If these people had been in some way or other deceived about the matter, it would be another transaction; but they enter into a transaction with the Attorney General of the United States; they enter into a contract with him in which he professes and purports to act as the representative of the Government of the United States. The ordinary duties of the head of the Department of Justice are in connection with litigation in which the Government of the United States is involved. If this were a matter concerning the apprehension of a criminal or the transportation of a criminal from a foreign country to this country, or if it touched in any way the conduct of the courts or the management of any public building devoted to the use of the courts, if it fell within what might be regarded as the general scope of the duties of the Attorney General of the United States, but there was no express law for it, the man might be excused for believing that the Attorney General had the power under the law which he assumed and ventured to exercise. The adjudications of the Supreme Court fully warrant the belief that when an officer of the Government, particularly the head of one of the departments, for a long period of years has pursued a practice with reference to the general subject matter the conduct of which is reposed in his department, it will be presumed that his act is with the approbation of the Congress of the United States, and it practically becomes in effect a law.

It was so decided in the case of the Midwest Oil Co., the decision in which is well known to the Senator from Oregon. There was a practice pursued by the Secretary of the Interior and the Department of the Interior for years and years and years and years with reference to the disposition of the public funds, and it was held that although there was not any express law authorizing him to do so, it was within his authority.

Here, however, is a case in which a department undertakes to act in a matter entirely outside of the scope of the business of that department. If this were the Secretary of Agriculture, if it were the Secretary of Commerce, there might possibly be some rule; but when B. H. Howell, Son & Co. go and deal with the Attorney General of the United States upon a subject of this kind, involving the expenditure of enough money upon their part to buy 70,000 tons of sugar, you would imagine, at least, that they would have taken some advice as to whether they had a right to make any such contract as that or not; and, turning to the statute enacted by the Congress of the United States, their counsel must have advised them that the Attorney General had no such power, had no such right; it was entirely outside of the authority conferred upon him by any statute whatever; and they could not undertake a transaction of that kind with any degree of safety to themselves.

Mr. President, it is a question as to whether we propose to say to the heads of these various departments that they are at liberty to make any kind of contract they please, within or without the general scope of the duties devolving upon them, and the Congress will stand back of that contract, or whether we are obliged to say to them: "We lay down the law for you. You must follow that law. You must confine your activities within the scope of the powers which we have reposed in you, because we shall not be responsible for any debts that you contract outside of that."

Mr. President, that is the way a private citizen acts. That is the way he deals in his own private affairs. If one undertakes to act for him in a matter concerning which he has granted him no authority whatever—indeed, where he has either expressly or impliedly taken the authority away from him—neither the law nor morals imposes any obligation upon him.

Take the case of the president of a corporation undertaking to make a contract beyond the scope of the powers conferred upon him either by the directors or by the stockholders of the corporation: The corporation are not subject to criticism, either upon moral or upon legal grounds, if they say, "We shall not be bound by a contract of that character."

But, Mr. President, there is more than that in this—a feature that has not been adverted to in the discussion thus far.

Bear in mind that B. H. Howell, Son & Co. were not risking one single dollar in this enterprise. According to their contention, they were acting for the Government of the United States as its agents, not buying this sugar upon their own account but buying it under a contract by which they were constituted the agents of the Government of the United States for the purpose of making the purchase. They were, as I have indicated before, obligated to advance the money necessary to make the purchase and to bring the sugar to the United States; but they ran no risk whatever, as is contended here. They were to get their money out of the sale of this sugar, and, if that was not enough, the Congress of the United States was to be called upon to make the necessary appropriation to take care of the transaction.

Let us see, Mr. President. They were to have 1 cent a pound clear upon all of this sugar. That was their contract. One cent a pound means $20 a ton. They were to buy 70,000 tons, and their profit was to be $1,400,000 upon this transaction, in which they did not risk a penny, and all they had to do was to go to Argentina, buy the sugar, put it on a ship, and their responsibility was gone. One million four hundred thousand dollars was to come to them for that simple work. I can not believe—I can not believe, Mr. President—that the services which they say they were called upon to render called for any such exorbitant compensation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator ever heard of a transaction in sugar involving its purchase 5,000 miles away and its transportation overseas at a net profit of but 1 cent a pound all expenses included?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I know something about that. I participated in an investigation of that subject as a member of a committee of this body at one time. My recollection is that the legitimate profit of the American Sugar Refining Co., which goes to Cuba and buys its sugar, taking all the responsibilities in the matter, putting out its own money, refining the sugar and putting it on the market, is less than 1 cent a pound.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Less than 1 cent a pound?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Less than 1 cent a pound, including the cost of refining.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know of any transoceanic transaction which has ever been carried on, or proposed to be carried on, at such a close margin of profit as that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, you will bear in mind that those people who get that margin are taking all of the risks of the market. They are venturing their own money in it. These people ventured not a dollar under the contention made in this case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is certainly mistaken in that. Under the contention made in this case, if he puts it on that assumption, he certainly is mistaken.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How am I mistaken? The Senator says they lost, or stand to lose, a million dollars upon this transaction, and he says the United States is morally obligated to make that good to them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the circumstances——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How have they risked a dollar?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Because the Government possessed the power over them all the time to hold them in this case whether they won or lost.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We are speaking about the money risk they took.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But we must consider all the facts when we begin to estimate risks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. The only risk they took was that Congress might repudiate the transaction and not make the appropriation; but assuming that the contract went through, and they acted in perfect good faith in the matter, they took no risk whatever.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Assuming that the Government did nothing else except what it proposed to do in the first instance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is again talking about the obstacles placed upon the disposition of this sugar in the Argentine.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am going to talk about that directly.

Mr. McNARY. I want to inquire of the Senator from Montana whether the 1 cent a pound paid for the transportation and refining, to which he referred, was in time of war?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What is the Senator's query?

Mr. McNARY. The reference the Senator made to 1 cent a pound as the cost of transportation and refining of sugar was not during the war?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no.

Mr. McNARY. That is quite a different proposition. At that particular time, and prior thereto, the Government was handling the sugar transportation from Cuba, a very short distance, and allowed 2 cents a pound.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That may or may not be. However, there is no evidence here at all which permits us to make any inquiry into it at all, but it does not make a bit of difference. The transportation feature to which the Senator has referred, and I am very glad he referred to it, cuts absolutely no figure whatever, because these people were entitled to 1 cent a pound no matter what the transportation cost was. That was their clear profit, and I venture to say that the American Sugar Refining Co. is doing business to-day upon less profit than a cent a pound, taking all the risks of the business, and meeting all the transportation charges.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I merely want to make the observation, if the Senator will permit me, that there is not a commercial concern on the face of the earth that could do business long on such a close margin.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Considering the amount of sugar that is consumed in this country, a very small margin will pay big dividends on the stock of the American Sugar Refining Co.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator must know that 1 cent a pound on a transaction of this kind, if it was conducted for any term of years, would not pay the expenses of maintaining the agencies in the foreign country, plus the insurance on the product, the cost of transportation, and the interest on the money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know anything of the kind, and I dispute the proposition. The whole transaction did not cover a period of more than three months, and it would have involved profit to B. H. Howell, Son & Co. of $1,400,000, if the transaction had been carried out as was suggested.

Mr. President, another feature of the case to which the Senator from New York has adverted is this: That these people, finding that the price of sugar in the United States had dropped—and I shall refer to that directly—tried to dispose of the sugar in the Argentine, and they said the Government of the United States would not let them.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that at the time this transaction was inaugurated, the Republic of the Argentine had an embargo upon the exportation of sugar, which had been in force for some time. For the purpose of providing the necessities of their own people, they had refused to allow sugar to be exported from the country. Thereupon the State Department of this country was importuned to enter into negotiations with the department of state of the Argentine Republic, and to represent to the state department of the Argentine Republic that this sugar belonged to the Government of the United States, and to ask them, as a matter of courtesy to the Government of the United States, to allow that sugar to go out of the Republic. They conceded that as a courtesy to the Government of the United States.

It is said that then the Attorney General would not allow B. H. Howell, Son & Co. to sell this sugar in the Argentine. It belonged to the Government of the United States. I see the Senator from New York shakes his head. To whom did it belong?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It belonged to the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If it belonged to the American Trading Co., if it was its sugar, upon what basis are we answerable in any way for losses they sustained by reason of a private transaction of their own?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It belonged to that company, as the Senator knows. They had put up the money to purchase the sugar, and they had done so at the request of our Government. The Government then told them that they must not resell it in the Argentine, because that would be a violation of a treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Argentine.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator point to some kind of a statute by which the Attorney General is enabled to tell B. H. Howell, Son & Co. that it can not sell its own sugar in the Argentine Republic? That seems to me a baby plea. If they wanted to sell their sugar in the Argentine because they feared they would have a loss on it if they brought it to the United States, and the Attorney General said, "I will not let you sell that sugar," it would seem to me as though they would take some advice of counsel, who, of course, would be obliged to tell them, "If this sugar is yours, the Attorney General has no power over you at all. He can not prevent you from selling your property in the Argentine Republic."

Mr. WADSWORTH. It should be recollected that these gentlemen were exceedingly loyal citizens; that is, loyal to the United States; and when they were told by their own Government that the sale of the sugar in the Argentine would seriously embarrass the Government of the United States in its relations with a foreign Government they obeyed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The claim of loyalty as to something which happened 18 months after the armistice does not appeal to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understood that loyalty continued indefinitely. The Senator will not contend that if they had sold the sugar in the Argentine at that time they would not have escaped from the predicament and made a little profit?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not know of any testimony to that effect in the record.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is such testimony.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. However that may be, it does not make a bit of difference to me. If that sugar belonged to the Government of the United States, then the Government of the United States had the right to say whether it should be sold in the Argentine or should not be sold in the Argentine. If it belonged to B. H. Howell, Son & Co., they had a perfect right to sell it in the Argentine or anywhere else, and the Government of the United States could not possibly stop them, and it is just baby talk to say, "We wanted to sell our own sugar and the Attorney General would not let us."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator say that the attitude of the State Department and of the Department of Justice in that respect was baby talk?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know. I do not care anything at all about it, whether it was or whether it was not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the governing feature in this matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not care anything at all about what the Department of Justice said about the matter. The Attorney General told us that he had authority under this law to make this contract, when the law itself expressly stated that he did not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was asking the Senator about the resale of the sugar and the attitude of the State Department and of the Department of Justice in telling these people that they must not resell it. The reasons are given in the official dispatches.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would seem to me that prudent business men under those circumstances would go to their own counsel and say, "We are in this predicament; they will not let us sell this sugar. Have they any right to stop us?"

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suppose legally they would have no right to stop them selling the sugar, but the United States Government had given certain assurances to the Argentine Government that such and such things would be done with the sugar, and when the Argentine Government informed the American ambassador at Buenos Aires that the resale of the sugar would be objectionable and obnoxious, our Government immediately told its agents that they must not sell the sugar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I said, that it told its agents that they must not sell the sugar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And the agents being loyal to the United States did not sell the sugar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It told its agents that they must not sell the sugar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If they were its agents, the Government of the United States had the right to give any directions it saw fit, and they can not complain.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In either event, the agents are not to blame.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In either event, of course, they are out this amount of money, that is all, and the question is, are they not out by reason of their own violation of the ordinary prudence which governs men in business transactions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator and the Congress are going to impose such standards of what he calls "ordinary goods" on citizens in their business relations with the Government, in time of crisis and stress the Government will hereafter get mighty little assistance from its citizens.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not admit there was any time of stress at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Government thought so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was 18 months after the armistice was signed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The time of stress was reflected in the price of sugar in the United States, which was 25 cents and more.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That reminds me; I was just coming to that. The evidence before the Committee on Agriculture, of course, was all submitted by those who wanted the bill passed, by those who desired that B. H. Howell & Son should be held harmless in this matter to the extent of more than $2,500,000. No one was there representing the Government of the United States except the committee. No one was interested in the defeat of the bill except so far as the committee was naturally antagonistic to an appropriation at this time from the Treasury of the United States. It seems quite likely that some of the suggestions which have now been made upon the floor, however valuable or valueless they may be, were entirely wanting before the committee. But all of the testimony, including that of the Attorney General, was to the effect that bringing this large amount of sugar to the United States broke the price of sugar, and that the great body of the people of the United States profited by getting their sugar at a lower price, and that is the basis of this claim.

What is the truth about that matter? The price of sugar broke the same as the prices of all other agricultural products broke about that time. Our people out West who expect to pay their debts by the sale of live stock of one kind or another met exactly the same condition. Live-stock prices broke earlier than did the price of sugar. The price of sugar held up pretty well until the month of August, 1920, and then fell with a crash. So the price of live stock, earlier in the year, about the month of May, dropped like lead. Wool, in the production of which my State leads, when it came upon the market in the month of June, 1920, went down to the bottom of the sea, leaving our people hopeless and despondent.

When the crops of that year came upon the market in the month of October, wheat and all other grains dropped in exactly the same manner. In the month of August sugar dropped. That is the plain truth about the matter. I asked the Bureau of Markets for information as to what occasioned the drop in sugar in the month of August of 1920, and the chief of that bureau did not tell me that it dropped because of this contract to bring in sugar from the Argentine. He said it had dropped because of exactly the same conditions that made all other agricultural products drop at that time, and dropped with a crash. That is the situation, and those people met exactly the same fate that multitudes of other people met. My constituents in my own State, from one end of the State to the other, met exactly the same condition, and they are not asking us to make good their losses.

I can not see any virtue in that measure at all. It seems to me plainly a bill to vote a subsidy, a gratuity of over $2,500,000 to these people, who say they did not know what the law was. They say they did not talk with their own counsel, their own attorneys. Why, Mr. President, this is a great, big commercial institution, able to employ the most accomplished and talented lawyers in the city of New York, who have communicated with me upon the subject. They did not even talk with their lawyers to find out whether the Attorney General of the United States had the power to go away outside of the scope of the duties we had reposed in him, to make a contract for the purchase of sugar in the Argentine Republic on the part of the Government of the United States for the purpose of distributing it generally throughout the country in order to break the sugar market.

Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that there have not been more Senators here during the discussion to get some kind of an idea of the matter that is involved. I know how this thing goes. Senators will come in and inquire, "How does the committee stand on this? It comes from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, does it?" "Yes." "Very well, we will vote to sustain the committee." That is the way the thing goes. I regret that it is so, but I could not refrain from expressing my own earnest denunciation of the measure as entirely unwarranted.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator from New York if he wishes to complete the joint resolution to-night? We would like to have a short executive session, and it is now 5 o'clock.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not informed whether any other Senator desires to speak on the question. May I ask the Senator from Montana if he intends to call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator and I probably agree that it would be very difficult to get a quorum to-night.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] desires to read into the record a portion of a very short dispatch which I omitted from my remarks. After he has done that, I shall be willing to yield for the purpose of moving an executive session.

Mr. MCNARY. I had intended to make a few observations, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, from which this measure came, and also to offer some documentary evidence. However, it would suit me just as well to take five minutes to-morrow morning, in order that we may have an executive session now.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN TREATIES.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I have before me copies of the proposed so-called four-power treaty, a copy of the treaty between Great Britain and Japan of the 13th day of July, 1911, and also a copy of one of the so-called Bryan peace treaties of 1914, which I would like to have printed together in the RECORD. I think they would be of some interest to Senators, and perhaps to others. I ask unanimous consent to have them printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the treaties were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and they are as follows:

TEXT OF FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan,

With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the regions of the Pacific Ocean,

(1) Have determined to conclude a treaty to this effect and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America,

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India,
And for the Dominion of Canada, ———,
For the Commonwealth of Australia, ———,
For the Dominion of New Zealand, ———,
For India, ———,
The President of the French Republic,
His Majesty the Emperor of Japan,
Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the regions of the Pacific Ocean.

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the high contracting parties to a joint conference, to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

ARTICLE II.

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly and separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

ARTICLE III.

This agreement shall remain in force for 10 years from the time it shall take effect, and after the expiration of said period it shall continue to be in force, subject to the right of any of the high contracting parties to terminate it upon 12 months' notice.

ARTICLE IV.

This agreement shall be ratified as soon as possible in accordance with the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties, and shall take effect on the deposit of ratifications, which shall take place at Washington, and thereupon the agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate.

TEXT OF ANGLO-JAPANESE TREATY.

PREAMBLE.

The Government of Great Britain and the Government of Japan, having in view the important changes which have taken place in the situation since the conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese agreement of the 12th August, 1905, and believing that a revision of that agreement responding to such changes would contribute to general stability and repose, have agreed upon the following stipulations to replace the agreement above mentioned, such stipulations having the same object as the said agreement, namely:

(a) The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India.

(b) The preservation of the common interests of all powers in China by insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire and the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China.

(c) The maintenance of the territorial rights of the high contracting parties in the regions of eastern Asia and of India, and the defense of their special interests in the said regions:

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed that whenever, in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan, any of the rights and interests referred to in the preamble of this agreement are in jeopardy, the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly, and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests.

ARTICLE II.

If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other high contracting party will at once come to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common, and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

ARTICLE III.

The high contracting parties agree that neither of them will, without consulting the other, enter into separate arrangements with another power to the prejudice of the objects described in the preamble of this agreement.

ARTICLE IV.

Should either high contracting party conclude a treaty of general arbitration with a third power, it is agreed that nothing in this agreement shall entail upon such contracting party an obligation to go to war with the power with whom such treaty of arbitration is in force.

ARTICLE V.

The conditions under which armed assistance shall be afforded by either power to the other in the circumstances mentioned in the present agreement and the means by which such assistance is to be made available will be arranged by the naval and military authorities of the high contracting parties, who will from time to time consult one another fully and freely upon all questions of mutual interest.

ARTICLE VI.

The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature, and remain in force for 10 years from that date.

In case neither of the high contracting parties should have notified 12 months before the expiration of the said 10 years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the high contracting parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war the alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded.

In faith whereof the undersigned, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this agreement and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at London the 13th day of July, 1911.

E. GREY,
His Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.
TAKAAKI KATO,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan at the Court of St. James.

TEXT OF WILSON-BRYAN TREATY (SAMPLE).

(All the treaties signed are identic mutatis mutandis, except for a few changes introduced into the treaties with the Netherlands and with Great Britain.)

TREATY TO FACILITATE THE SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES (BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE).

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic, desiring to strengthen the friendly relations which unite their two countries and to serve the cause of general peace, have decided to conclude a treaty for these purposes and have consequently appointed the plenipotentiaries designated hereinafter, to wit:

The President of the United States of America, the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State of the United States; and

The President of the French Republic, His Excellency J. J. Jusserand, ambassador of the French Republic to the United States;

Who, after exhibiting to each other their full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

Any disputes arising between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the French Republic, of whatever nature they may be, shall, when ordinary diplomatic proceedings have failed and the high contracting parties do not have recourse to arbitration, be submitted for investigation and report to a permanent international commission, constituted in the manner prescribed in the following article.

The high contracting parties agree not to resort, with respect to each other, to any act of force during the investigation to be made by the commission and before its report is handed in.

ARTICLE II.

The international commission shall be composed of five members, appointed as follows: Each Government shall designate two members, only one of whom shall be of its own nationality; the fifth member shall be designated by common consent and shall not belong to any of the nationalities already represented on the commission; he shall perform the duties of president.

In case the two Governments shall be unable to agree on the choice of the fifth commissioner, the other four shall be called upon to designate him, and failing an understanding between them, the provisions of article 45 of The Hague convention of 1907 shall be applied.

The commission shall be organized within six months from the exchange of ratifications of the present convention.

The members shall be appointed for one year and their appointment may be renewed. They shall remain in office until superseded or reappointed, or until the work on which they are engaged at the time their office expires is completed.

Any vacancies which may arise—from death, resignation, or cases of physical or moral incapacity—shall be filled within the shortest possible period in the manner followed for the original appointment.

The high contracting parties shall, before designating the commissioners, reach an understanding in regard to their compensation. They shall bear by halves the expenses incident to the meeting of the commission.

ARTICLE III.

In case a dispute should arise between the high contracting parties which is not settled by the ordinary methods each party shall have a right to ask that the investigation thereof be intrusted to the international commission charged with making a report. Notice shall be given to the president of the international commission, who shall at once communicate with his colleagues.

In the same case the president may, after consulting his colleagues and upon receiving the consent of a majority of the members of the commission, offer the services of the latter to each of the contracting parties. Acceptance of that offer declared by one of the two Governments shall be sufficient to give jurisdiction of the case to the commission in accordance with the foregoing paragraph.

The place of meeting shall be determined by the commission itself.

ARTICLE IV.

The two high contracting parties shall have a right, each on its own part, to state to the president of the commission what is the subject matter of the controversy. No difference in these statements, which shall be furnished by way of suggestion, shall arrest the action of the commission.

In case the cause of the dispute should consist of certain acts already committed or about to be committed, the commission shall as soon as possible indicate what measures to preserve the rights of each party ought in its opinion to be taken provisionally and pending the delivery of its report.

ARTICLE V.

As regards the procedure which it is to follow, the commission shall as far as possible be guided by the provisions contained in articles 9 to 36 of convention 1 of The Hague of 1907.

The high contracting parties agree to afford the commission all means and all necessary facilities for its investigation and report.

The work of the commission shall be completed within one year from the date on which it has taken jurisdiction of the case, unless the high contracting parties shall agree to set a different period.

The conclusion of the commission and the terms of its report shall be adopted by a majority. The report, signed only by the President, acting by virtue of his office, shall be transmitted by him to each of the contracting parties.

The high contracting parties reserve full liberty as to the action to be taken on the report of the commission.

ARTICLE VI.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and by the President of the French Republic, in accordance with the constitutional laws of France.

It shall go into force immediately after the exchange of ratifications and shall last five years.

Unless denounced six months at least before the expiration of the said period of five years, it shall remain in force until the expiration of a period of 12 months after either party shall have notified the other of its intention to terminate it.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty and have affixed thereunto their seals.

Done at Washington this 15th day of September, in the year 1914.

[SEAL.] JUSSERAND.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 14, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, while chance and change are around about us, yet Thy goodness never faileth. Along our way Thy spirit seeks to hush us into peace. How we long for the joy that time can not ravish. O renew the freshness of the early years, the happy expectation of to-morrow and the zest of life that looks of the good time coming. O for the bound of soul that sorrow can not hold down; O for the freedom of spirit that burdens can not crush; O for the vigor of heart that criticism can not chill. Break into the inner circle of our beings and give us back the childhood of the soul. Then shall we find rest in labor and be prepared to go back to the arms of the Father and into the homeland of eternity. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REREFERENCE OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have rereferred to the Committee on Indian Affairs Senate joint resolution 59.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House is entitled to have the title reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand——

Mr. SNYDER. This is a joint resolution that was passed by the Senate in the last session of Congress. The Indian Affairs Committee reported it out. Since then information has come to the committee that requires the necessity of rewriting the joint resolution in order to bring it before the House in proper form.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what it is about?

Mr. SNYDER. I would be glad to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution 59.

A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to protect certain restricted members of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the rereference? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 9237.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINNOTT. When is the proper time to make a point of order?

The SPEAKER. After the report has been made.

(For conference report and statement see House proceedings of December 13, pp. 310, 311.)

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order against the conference report in that the conferees have exceeded their authority in agreeing to Senate amendment No. 34 and for the further reason that this is a deficiency bill and they have no right to agree to such an amendment and it is new legislation.

The SPEAKER. What page?

Mr. SINNOTT. Page 33, amendment No. 34.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this amendment, and as the amendment is understood in the Interior Department, it endeavors to divert funds that have been appropriated for in the act of March 2, 1919, appropriated for and devoted to the payment of certain war mineral claimants who are covered under section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919. This claim referred to herein, the claim of George Carden and Anderson T. Herd, is a claim within the jurisdiction solely of the War Department. Now, under that act the War Department has jurisdiction over the settlement of certain contract claims, express and implied. Under section 5 the Secretary of the Interior has jurisdiction to adjust and make awards upon certain war relief claims, claims filed by persons who got out for governmental purposes chrome, manganese, and other ores. There are two entirely different purposes provided for in the act of 1919. The claims are presented in an entirely different way and the statute of limitations is different pertaining to the War Department—different from that pertaining to the Department of the Interior. The claims provided for in the first part of the act may be taken into the Court of Claims——.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the matter might be simplified if the Chair should be assured that there is no difference of opinion as to the question of fact before we get to the question of law. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he agrees?

Mr. MADDEN. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read in reply to the question of the Speaker the Dent Act.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman agree to the fact that this is an appropriation different——

Mr. MADDEN. No, sir; I do not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have to investigate the facts.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like for the gentleman to yield to me a few minutes to state the facts.

Mr. SINNOTT. I would like to have the matter cleared up, if it can be.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, here is the fund from which the appropriation is to be made:

Unexpended balances: Such amounts of the unexpended balances of the appropriations chargeable with the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department, consequent upon the suspension of hostilities, and with the adjustment of claims under the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, shall remain upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the respective appropriations and be available for similar purposes until June 30, 1922, and of said amounts not to exceed $250,000 shall also be available for such personal services as in the discretion of the Secretary of War are necessary to properly protect the interests of the United States in making such settlements and adjustments: Provided, That no part of said amounts shall be used to pay any claims arising out of any contract or other obligation unless such contract or obligation was entered into subsequently to April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918.

These are all unexpended balances, all out of the War Department, and have no relation whatever to the subject upon which the gentleman is discoursing. And Gen. Lord, the finance officer of the War Department, has just stated that they have sufficient balances in the fund, in connection with which I have just made this statement, to pay the item carried in the bill, and that it in no sense infringes upon the appropriation set out in the statement of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the act to which the gentleman has just referred also an act approved March 2, 1919?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and June 16, 1921.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but the act referred to in this amendment is the act approved March 2, 1919?

Mr. MADDEN. The 1919 act is the Dent Act, and is only descriptive in this connection.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the act that covers the chrome and mineral claimants.

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all.

Mr. SINNOTT. I have been following your reading.

Mr. MADDEN. One part of the Dent Act carried them, but the appropriation set out for the liquidation of the claims under the mineral proposition was made as a separate item, and under the Interior Department, and this relates entirely to the War Department, and the War Department has all the funds it needs to meet the obligation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There was authorization in the Dent Act for settlement of claims both in the War Department and Interior Department, as I understand?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The appropriation made by the second deficiency act of 1921 was an appropriation purely for the settlement of claims in the War Department?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And not for the Interior Department?

Mr. MADDEN. Not for the Interior Department.

Mr. MANN. As I understand this item, it only relates to the appropriation in the deficiency act of 1921, which related to the War Department?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly; and does not touch the other matter at all. We were careful about that, and went thoroughly into it and consulted with the War Department about it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, if I were convinced that such was the proper construction, of course I would withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman listen to me?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. We have gotten the information within 10 minutes from the finance officer of the War Department. I can assure the gentleman that there is no question whatever about where the fund is from which this payment will be made.

Mr. SINNOTT. I was talking to Judge Robinson this morning over the phone. He is the chairman of the commission that has the adjudication of these war mineral claims, and it is his construction that this would encroach upon the fund appropriated for in the act of March 2, 1919, for the mineral claims. He further told me that he was informed yesterday by the War Department that there were no funds on hand to pay such claims as this, and that it was generally understood that the parties interested in this claim were endeavoring to have it paid out of the unexpended balance left over from the war minerals relief portion of that act.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SINNOTT. In just a moment. Furthermore, the act reads:

That the unexpended balances of appropriations * * * consequent upon the suspension of hostilities.

Now, this is the language:

And with the adjustment of claims under the act approved March 2, 1919, shall be available for the payment of this claim.

I have the act of March 2, 1919, here, and section 5 refers to the war minerals relief claims, and to none other, adjudicated by the Interior Department. The first part of the act refers to those who had claims with the War Department.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. In the conversation just a few minutes ago with the war finance officer of the War Department we were assured that they will have at the end of the fiscal year, after adjudicating such claims as are now in process of adjudication, out of the funds appropriated in the deficiency act of 1921, $15,000,000 in the War Department of an unexpended balance. It would be absurd to assume that they would take $550,000 out of another appropriation when they have so much money in another fund and in another department.

Mr. SINNOTT. Furthermore, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 12, on page 248, there is the specific statement, if I may be permitted to refer to it, made by Senator POINDEXTER in approving this amendment, that the payment is to be made out of the $8,500,000.

Mr. MADDEN. But he was mistaken.

Mr. SINNOTT. He may be.

Mr. MADDEN. I have made a thorough investigation of this.

Mr. SINNOTT. That could be very easily corrected by going to conference and striking out four or five words.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can take my word for it that there is no such condition as he portrays.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] will yield, this appropriation in this amendment purely relates, as I understand it, to unexpended balances of appropriations made by the second deficiency act of 1921.

Then the language of the amendment goes on to explain what those appropriations are for, to pay certain claims under the Dent Act. But the appropriation made by the deficiency act of 1921 was principally for claims in the War Department. This only makes those appropriations available. It does not make any of the appropriations in the original Dent Act available, and it would not affect the Interior Department.

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, if it is limited by the language in that deficiency act to which the gentleman refers, then it would be all right.

Mr. MANN. It is so limited. There is a specific appropriation in the deficiency act of 1921 limiting it very closely to certain specific items, and not in any way affecting any of the items in the Interior Department.

Mr. SINNOTT. But the apprehension of Judge Robinson, the head of the board, is that it is subject to the construction that I have advanced.

Mr. MANN. Plainly he has not read the deficiency act of 1921 and this amendment, one of the two, because on its face it is just as clear as daylight.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I differ from the gentleman from Illinois as to the scope and effect of the deficiency act of 1921. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the War Department were, of course, thinking about one class of claims and one business, but the Speaker must understand that the act of March 2, 1919, referred to in the deficiency act, and also referred to in this amendment No. 34 of the Senate—he must understand that that was the general act, and the general act originally provided solely for war contracts. But it was amended by putting in what is known as section 5, which was a complete law covering the adjustment of claims growing out of the procurement of war minerals; in other words, known as the war mineral relief act.

Now, in the act of March 2, 1919, there were two distinct and separate features, both of which were for the settlement of claims; one of them a War Department fund and the other a fund made available to pay awards by the Interior Department on account of claims growing out of the activities of four branches or bureaus of the Government other than the War Department. Now, when the second deficiency act of 1921 came up, at that time I and others who were interested in continuing this fund were advised that the War Department was only seeking to continue its part, and the question arose as to whether or not we should insist upon a separate amendment. Members of the House and of the Senate both went into that question at that time and decided that the language was so clear and unequivocal that it covered all amounts of unexpended balances. I will read the language of the second deficiency bill:

> Such amounts of the unexpended balances of the appropriation chargeable with the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department consequent upon the suspension of hostilities, and—

If you were to stop there, it would only cover the War Department, but it goes on—> and for the adjustment of claims under an act—

And then it cites the title of the act of March 2, 1919; in other words, "and for the adjustment of claims."

Now, under the act of March 2, 1919, there were two classes of claims, and the reason why those others interested in war minerals did not offer a separate amendment was that it was the unanimous judgment of everyone who examined that provision of the second deficiency bill that was pending that it was sufficient. Especially was that true of some Senators who were watching it very closely; and they satisfied me and other Members of the House that that language would take care of and continue the unexpended balance of the Interior Department funds.

Now, let us see what was the interpretation of the Senate. Some of the Senators who were opposed to that interpretation afterwards found out that that was the law. What did they do? They introduced and passed through the Senate in the last session of Congress a bill to cover back into the Treasury this unexpended balance that had been continued under the second deficiency act, and we held it up here in the House, as the Speaker will recall, and not only held it up, but passed a bill providing for a review of the claims, and the Speaker will recall the controversy that arose over the provision continuing the appropriation. It was the opinion of all of us that it was absolutely unnecessary to put that appropriating provision in there, and finally that was decided, and the Senate agreed to the House amendment cutting it out, with an amendment, because it was specifically stated on this floor and accepted by the House that that was continued, and the proposed provision making the unexpended balances of appropriation available was unnecessary because the second deficiency act of 1921 had specifically continued all unexpended balances of the act of March 2, 1919; not only unexpended balances of the War Department fund, but of the war minerals fund in addition to the War Department fund, and all other funds under that act.

Now, this amendment No. 34 goes along and attempts to repeat the language of the second deficiency act. But look at the top of page 34 of the bill as it comes to us. It goes further and quotes this act:

> And with the adjustment of claims under the act approved March 2, 1919.

Why did not the gentleman do as was suggested to be done yesterday? It was very easy to put in a line of that amendment the words "and chargeable to the War Department funds." That would have been very easy. Then there would be no question.

The trouble is that the gentleman from Illinois can not give us an assurance that will bind the comptroller. I do not know what this one will do, but the last one refused to be bound by the intention of the House, as clearly expressed. Now, it is true that Gen. Lord made the statement referred to a few minutes ago, and if the comptroller would accept the assurance of the gentleman from Illinois, there would be no difficulty. I was present at the time the conversation with Gen. Lord over the telephone was carried on 10 minutes ago, and it is true that he said that there are ample funds in the War Department item, and for that reason I think it will not affect it; but I did not want the record to go unchallenged and leave it so that the comptroller reading the record would say that the Congress had so decided. I do not think the Speaker is bound to sustain the point of order, but on the assurance that Gen. Lord has given us, I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

My only object in calling attention to it is to show specifically for the record what is the condition, and not have it appear that we acquiesced in the theory that the act of 1921 only continued one fund provided by the act of March 2, 1919, and did not continue the other. So I trust that the gentleman from Oregon will withdraw his point of order, as we have the assurance of Gen. Lord that there are ample funds in the War Department fund, so that the war minerals funds will not be used.

The SPEAKER. Before the point of order is decided the Chair thinks it would be well to have the question of fact settled. The Chair would be glad to hear any argument that the deficiency bill of 1921 does not extend the whole of the Dent Act. It seems to the Chair that the argument made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is a strong one.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Dent Act provides that the Secretary of War shall have the power to settle only claims that originated under the formal or informal contracts within the War Department or contracts that may have been authorized by the President of the United States and in performance of its functions under the authority granted in this act to settle claims referred to in the report of the managers of the House. The question whether he had authority to make that settlement was in doubt, and he referred the matter to the Attorney General of the United States, and in an opinion rendered by the Attorney General he was advised that the act of the President brought the claim within the scope of his jurisdiction; and acting under what he believed and what the Attorney General said was his authority he settled the claim, which was a war claim, not under a mineral contract but under a claim that originated in a transaction between Carden and Herd and the President of the United States.

This being an act of the President, and the Dent Act providing that the act of the President in any case shall be settled by the Secretary of War if there is a dispute, it is contended that the Secretary acted within his rights and within the law.

A warrant was issued by the Secretary of War to meet the payment under the settlement and presumably out of the funds that are at the disposal of the War Department in unexpended balances, and have no reference whatever to any unexpended balances to the credit of the war minerals settlement fund.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Does this claim arise out of some contract?

Mr. MADDEN. It arises out of a contract for the purchase of ships owned by citizens of Austria in the early part of the war.

Mr. WALSH. Is the claim itself founded upon a contract?

Mr. MADDEN. The contention of the claimants is that they entered into a contract with certain citizens under which they were to act as the agents for the purchase of seven Austrian ships for a New York syndicate. They had made a contract with the Austrian owners of the ships and had agreed upon the price. They were to turn these ships over to a New York syndicate, who were to be the owners and operators of the ships between neutral ports in South America and ports of the United States. This was before we declared war with Austria. After the President ascertained that the sale of the ships was about to be made he sent for Carden and Herd. He told them he wanted these ships turned over to the Government of the United States, and he wanted them turned over without any profit. The President authorized Denman, chairman of the Shipping Board, to begin negotiations for the purchase of the ships, with the understanding that there would be no profit to Carden and Herd in the transaction. After Denman had been negotiating for some time under the instructions of the President, the President transferred the authority to negotiate to Bernard Baruch, and he continued the negotiations.

In the course of the negotiations it was stated by Carden and Herd that they had a prospective profit in the sale of these ships, but the President insisted there should be no profit. In the course of the negotiations it was found that Carden and Herd had promised to pay a commission to an Austrian citizen by the name of Festetichs and to an American citizen, Mr. Tomlinson, in addition to the price agreed upon, which was said to be cost. Carden and Herd insisted that they be permitted to pay Festetichs and Tomlinson the commission, and Mr. Baruch allowed them $194,000 for that purpose, out of which they paid Festetichs and Tomlinson $80,000, leaving them $114,000. Carden and Herd claimed they had incurred other expenses connected with the negotiations for the purchase or sale of the ships amounting to $84,000, and the Government allowed them that. Then, before the negotiations were finally completed for the transfer of the ships to the United States, it was found that in the sale of the ships by Carden and Herd to the American syndicate they had imposed neutral conditions on the use of the ships; that conditions were imposed which would prevent the use of the ships except in South American ports and the United States ports. In the course of the negotiations Mr. Baruch and the President said they could not take the ships with neutral conditions imposed, and so they undertook to remove the neutral conditions. The Government of the United States was called upon to pay some $1,050,000 for the removal of the neutral conditions, and they also demanded and received from the Government $188,000 in commission on the sale.

Later it was found that they had, they said, incurred obligations for legal services amounting to $20,000, and they were allowed $15,000 for that. And altogether, deducting the $80,000 that was paid by Carden and Herd to Festestichs and Tomlinson, they had $401,000 left as their fee in the transaction. They claimed, of course, that they spent all this money for expenses in the course of the negotiations. Whether they did or not, I do not know.

Then it was said that Mr. Baruch promised Carden and Herd that if the ships were sold to the Government with the neutral restrictions removed and without profit to the sellers, they might be permitted to operate the ships under the MO–4 contract that was then in force under the Shipping Board, that managing owners' contract under which they were to get 5 per cent of the gross receipts as their commission for operation.

In the testimony taken in the trial of the claim of Carden and Herd, Mr. Baruch was put upon the witness stand. He did not say that he did not promise to give them the right to operate, but he would not admit that he did, and there was a contention about whether there was any implied or other contract under which they were to have this right. They set up a claim for $7,500,000 for prospective profits, which they claimed they would have made if they had operated the ships. That claim was rejected. The first board that tried the case, I understand, made an award of $4,500,000. That award was referred to an appeal board, and the appeal board rejected it.

Then the matter was referred to Secretary of War Baker. He was just about to retire. This case was lying on his desk when he was about to go out. He called the attention of the incoming Secretary of War to it, and the incoming Secretary took up the question. He made the investigation. There was some doubt about his authority to settle the claim. He had doubts himself. He referred the question of authority to the Attorney General of the United States, who wrote an opinion, in which he set out that it was within the power of the Secretary of War to settle the case. The Secretary of War made a settlement. I understand he rejected the claim of Carden and Herd on the ground of prospective profits, which the Dent Act distinctly prohibits. He took into consideration the question of how much profit they were able to prove they would have made direct in the sale of the ships, and he also took into consideration, as I understand, the amount paid by the Government—this $401,000—and then he deducted the $401,000 from the amount which he ascertained would have been the profit if the sale had been completed to the New York syndicate, and then he deducted $40,000 from what was left and he awarded $550,000 as the amount that he found to be due to Carden and Herd, to be paid out of the unexpended balances at his disposal for the disposition of cases in the War Department, and he issued a warrant on the Treasury for the payment of the $550,000.

When that warrant was submitted for payment the Comptroller General ruled, not that the Secretary of War had no power to settle or that the settlement was not fair or just, but that it would not be possible to pay the award out of the unexpended balances that were to the credit of the War Department, because these unexpended balances were standing to the credit of specific funds for the payment of specific awards in connection with those specific items, and it was because there was no specific fund out of which it could be paid in the unexpended balances that the Comptroller General decided against the payment. So it came to us.

It came to us in many forms. There has been legislation pending which, if enacted, would take all the unexpended balances, amounting to about $39,000,000, including the unexpended balance in the mineral claims act, amounting to about $4,000,000, and place them to the credit of the Secretary of War for the payment of such awards as he might make. But the Committee on Appropriations determined not to permit the transfer of these unexpended balances in blank for the settlement of claims about which no one knew anything, and after months of careful consideration and a great deal of investigation it was finally concluded that the only way to prevent the use of the unexpended balances or to prevent committing them to any uses that we knew nothing whatever about was to provide specifically for the payment of the award to Carden and Herd, and that item was included in the bill in the Senate, as you see, and was agreed to by the House conferees in its present form, and we know, or we think we know, that there is no chance whatever for the payment of any part of this claim out of any funds except funds that are now unexpended to the credit of the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Upon what contract, express or implied, is this claim based for which the award of $550,000 has been made?

Mr. MADDEN. This was on the contract under which the President of the United States authorized the purchase of the seven Austrian ships which were about to be transferred to a New York syndicate.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the ships had been paid for.

Mr. MADDEN. The ships had been paid for.

Mr. WALSH. Now, upon what contract other than that for the payment of the ships was this award of $550,000 based? What was the contract, express or implied, and who made the contract?

Mr. MADDEN. The claim was based, as I understand it and as I thought I explained very fully, on the claim that the President of the United States took from the pockets of Carden and Herd a profit which they could have made in the transfer of the ships to the private owners, a New York syndicate.

Mr. WALSH. But the act to which the gentleman refers contained a specific proviso that none of these claims shall be paid based on profits or prospective profits, and the act does not permit the appropriation of a gift to anyone.

Mr. MADDEN. In what I have said I have given the history of the case.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that the award of the Secretary of War for $550,000 was on account of the commission that Carden and Herd were entitled to and had earned.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I said.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For the ships they had already sold to the syndicate, consummated, and for which the money had been turned over. They had to give the money back to the New York syndicate to which they had sold the ships on the request of the President of the United States that the ships be sold to the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to say, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that these were profits which could have been earned, not which had been earned.

Mr. MADDEN. Profits which would be received if the completion of the sale to the syndicate had not been interrupted by the President.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman used the expression "could have been."

Mr. MADDEN. I do not remember my words.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Those were the gentleman's words.

Mr. MADDEN. They made the claim that they would have made certain profits if they were allowed to operate the ships.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Were they prospective profits?

Mr. MADDEN. They were.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Were they allowed?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They would have made them if they had an opportunity.

Mr. MADDEN. No; and the claim was not settled upon that basis. I thought I explained the matter very fully, that the award was made upon the basis of the difference between what the Government paid and what the syndicate was about to pay when the transfer was prevented by the President of the United States.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COPLEY. Did not the syndicate agree to pay, and had not that money already been earned as a commission?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I do not know; I would not undertake to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that we seem to be discussing the merits of the proposition at the present time, rather than the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the Chair was asking me to discuss the merits.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the Chair would suggest that the point of order be now considered. Before we come to that, the Chair would like to state that it seems to the Chair that the appropriation in the deficiency act of 1921 clearly covered the whole Dent Act, including section 5, so that it seems to the Chair this appropriation could be paid, if it is passed, out of the fund provided in the Dent Act. Of course, it does not follow that it is necessarily subject to the point of order, and the Chair will hear the gentleman from Oregon on that question.

Mr. MADDEN. This is placed under the War Department absolutely; it is not placed under any definite appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It comes under the unexpended balances provided for in the deficiency act of 1921. It does not follow, of course, that it is subject to a point of order, and the Chair will hear the gentleman from Oregon as to whether or not it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. The unexpended balances would come under the Interior Department; but it is not under that, it is under the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Why is it under the War Department?

Mr. MADDEN. As the Chair will see on page 32 of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman means that this item is under the subhead "War Department."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman claim that would prevent its being paid out of the Interior Department fund?

Mr. MADDEN. I do; yes.

Mr. WINGO. You look to the text of the law and not to the caption.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Oregon as to whether it is subject to the point of order, provided it could be paid out of either fund.

Mr. SINNOTT. This is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Why is it legislation?

Mr. SINNOTT. It is legislation settling a private claim against the Government, and it is legislation diverting moneys that have been appropriated and devoted to a certain limited number of claims, among which this is not included, devoting that appropriation to the payment of this claim, a claim that is not embraced at all in section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919. We might just as well provide that this claim shall be paid out of the reclamation fund, a fund devoted to another purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard for a moment on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I am still of the same opinion that I was when I argued this point of order, when it came up specifically for one of the purposes expressly provided in the Dent Act. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] ruled this out, and I thought he was wrong then, and I think the Speaker now can rule that this is including in a class of claims a certain claim, and that does not necessarily make it subject to a point of order, because while it indirectly places a burden on the appropriation and while this specifically says unexpended balances shall be available for that, it plainly comes within the general class intended to be covered by the Dent Act—claims other than express legal liability growing out of work done.

Mr. SINNOTT. The very fact that they are demanding this legislation and appropriation shows that it is legislation, because if it were embraced within the Dent Act it would not be necessary for them to come here, but would be paid by the Secretary of War under the act itself. The very fact that they are here demanding the legislation shows what it is.

The SPEAKER. The question that arises is whether a reappropriation of a fund which is not specifically appropriated to this purpose, and therefore is appropriated to another purpose, is legislation.

The Chair assumes that this claim has been adjudicated or adjusted and only needs an appropriation. Indeed, the Chair is informed that a warrant was actually drawn for it by the Secretary of War which the comptroller refused to pass because the appropriation had not been made.

Now, it does not seem to the Chair that it is legislation to make a reappropriation of funds to a purpose which was not embraced in the original appropriation. It seems to the Chair the Appropriations Committee has the right to appropriate from a fund different from the one from which normally the payment would be made, and therefore this amendment is not subject to the point of order——

Mr. SINNOTT. Has the attention of the Chair been called to a citation in the manual of a decision of Chairman Hay?

The SPEAKER. Yes. There are several decisions in the print which are contradictory. There are decisions both ways. The Chair thinks inasmuch as the Committee on Appropriations has the right to appropriate if there was no fund at all, that it is not legislation to reappropriate from a fund which has been originally allotted for another purpose, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the Chair allow one question? I want to ask the chairman of the committee what action the Senate took with reference to the appropriation for the cure of tuberculosis in cattle?

Mr. MADDEN. The Senate did not take any action. We have taken action, but we will reach that in a few moments.

Mr. HUDSPETH. All right.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. This $550,000 in the case of Carden and Herd will be paid out of some other fund than the war mineral relief act?

Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing to be paid out of the war mineral fund. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a short statement in connection with the agreement entered into by the House managers on this bill. The House agreed to the payment of various items put into the bill by the Senate amounting to $789,457.34, $700,000 of which is judgments of the Court of Claims and audited claims, leaving only $89,000 for various other items, to which the House managers agreed in conference.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment, let me make this statement. The Senate receded from items which they had inserted in the bill amounting in the aggregate to $2,819,725. The total of the bill as it left the House was $103,719,936.58. The total of the bill as it passed the Senate was $108,098,268.92. The total of the bill as it comes back to the House is $105,277,543.92. If the recommendations of the conferees prevail as to some of the items I think it may be said that in the consideration of the problems involved in the differences between the two Houses that the House really was very successful in having eliminated items inserted by the Senate. In this connection there are some items that we have come back to the House with to which we could not agree under the rules of the House.

One of those items is the eradication of tuberculosis in animals amounting to $600,000. Another one is an item of $110 for a claim for damage created by the action of a boat under the control of the Coast Guard. Another item is for $175,000 for the continuation of air mail service between New York and San Francisco, making a total of $775,110, or, if added to the $789,000 already referred to, would make a total of $1,564,567.34 which will be added to the bill as it passed the House. In addition to that we have this so-called Carden and Herd item of $550,000 which we are not now adding to the sum total of the bill because if it is approved it will not be an appropriation; it will be a payment from appropriations already made. In addition to that we will have an item for the completion of the purchase of land near Fairmont, W. Va., $29,750. It appears that authority was granted to the War Department to purchase land at this point. Appropriations were made for the payment of the land under the authority to purchase. The purchase was not completed. The appropriation reverted to the Treasury. The deed was made and transfer ready and the War Department finally decided it did not want the land, although it had a contract which obligated it to take the land, and they refused to take the deed. The owner of the land then instituted proceedings in the Court of Claims. The Department of Justice advised the War Department that it would be better all around to carry out the terms of the contract, and having no money with which to complete the contract, the money previously appropriated having gone back into the Treasury, it became necessary to ask for this additional appropriation to carry out the agreement entered into under the circumstances that I have just described. Now if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] wishes some time I will yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman spoke of audited claims. The Post Office Department has some audited claims, at least they are so-called by the department, arising out of the demotion of collectors some years ago. The gentleman no doubt is familiar with the situation. Are those included in this deficiency appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not be able to say that definitely, I have all the claims here.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman I could not get that information from the Post Office Department. Are they listed——

Mr. MADDEN. Every item is separately listed; look at the back of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The claim I am looking for is not here.

Mr. MADDEN. They have not reported it. If they had reported it, it would have been appropriated for. It is not the fault of the committee but of the Post Office Department.

Mr. MANN. The audited claims do not come from the Post Office Department; they come from the Treasury Department.

Mr. MADDEN. They have not come to us.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH moves that the conference report be recommitted to the conferees and that the managers on the part of the House be instructed not to agree to Senate amendment No. 34.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 42.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of no quorum. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 82, nays 219, answered "present" 2, not voting 129, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have amendment No. 15 reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 15: Amend, page 11, line 2, by inserting the following:

"BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

"General expenses: To enable the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, to perform the duties imposed upon it by the Agricultural appropriation act approved March 3, 1921, for the payment of indemnities on account of cattle slaughtered in connection with the eradication of tuberculosis from animals, $600,000: Provided, That this sum shall be expended only in payment to owners whose cattle have been in their possession for a period of at least six months prior to slaughter: Provided further, That no part of said sum shall be expended for the payment of indemnities to owners of herds hereafter placed under Federal and State supervision, unless such herds are located in circumscribed areas designated and agreed upon by the States and the Federal Government in which to conduct cooperative tuberculosis eradication work."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recede and concur in the amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Senate amendment numbered 17 be reported and concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report Senate amendment No. 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 17: Amend, page 14, line 5, by striking out the figures "$613,500" and inserting "$1,213,500."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 25: On page 23 of the bill, after line 12, insert:

"For the operation and maintenance of the airplane mail service between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., via Chicago, Ill., and Omaha, Nebr., including necessary incidental expenses and employment of necessary personnel, $250,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 25 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: "In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert '$175,000.'"

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the last appropriation bill $1,250,000 was appropriated for the Air Mail Service between New York and San Francisco. This was the amount authorized last year, and I opposed it. As I recall, under preceding administrations this activity was conducted and partially paid for out of funds appropriated for the Railway Mail Service. No authority was ever granted to take funds out of the Railway Mail Service to pay for the conduct of this activity, but it was done, and the result is that while on the face it appears that this service was being conducted for $1,250,000 a year the fact is that it cost a very much larger sum.

Estimates were proposed by the President for $350,000 to be added to the existing appropriation of $1,250,000. The House committee declined to recommend the appropriation. The bill went to the Senate. The Senate added $250,000. In the conference the House conferees endeavored to the best of their ability to eliminate the entire item, but I think it may be fairly said that, notwithstanding my opposition to the whole activity from start to finish; notwithstanding the excessive cost of transporting the mail by air, which is $5.35 per ton-mile as against 9 cents per ton-mile by mail; and notwithstanding the further fact that the mail carried by air pays no postage whatever, because they only take the mail off the train and advance it to the next train, and really the postage paid goes to the railroad for carrying the mail; and so I say that no postage whatever is paid on any mail carried by air; yet, inasmuch as it seems to be manifest that if this experiment is to be continued it can not be successfully continued unless this additional sum is appropriated, we have agreed to the amendment that I propose.

I believe now, as I have believed in the past, that we might very well reduce the number of trips made by these transcontinental experiments; but the department believes that that would destroy the efficiency of the service and that the experiments would not be of the same value under such circumstances as they will be if they have daily communication, and I may say that this is a compromise to reach other compromises in the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then, as I understand the gentleman's explanation, if we cut this $250,000 out we simply have fewer of these experimental trips?

Mr. MADDEN. That is true.

Mr. SNELL. They think it would ruin the service to have fewer of these trips?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. I want to say to the gentleman and to the House that personally I would not have agreed to the $175,000, but we had other items in the bill that were of far greater importance and which carried larger sums of money, where the compromises might not have been successful if we had not agreed about this.

Mr. SNELL. On the strength of that statement I shall vote for this, but under other conditions I would not.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that under other circumstances I would not vote for it, but under the present circumstances the House has made a very good compromise.

Mr. SNELL. The House conferees are always opposed to this appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the opinion that he has just now expressed comes from the Post Office Department or from the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. MADDEN. It comes from the Post Office Department.

Mr. CHALMERS. It comes from the department?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment with an amendment.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that amendment No. 26 be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 26: Page 24, line 11, strike out "$3,599,482.66" and insert "$3,849,482.66."

Mr. MADDEN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 26 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$3,774,482.66."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on amendment No. 27.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 16, strike out "$6,525,924.08" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,825,924.08."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recede and concur with an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in the said amendment insert "$6,750,934.08."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask the Clerk to report amendment No. 29.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment, No. 29.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 29: On page 32 of the bill, after line 7, insert:

"COAST GUARD.

"For payment of damages caused by collision of Coast Guard cutter Manning with the schooner Alice May Davenport, belonging to Acostia & Cia, $110."

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why is this item carried in a deficiency bill, and what is the reason why it should not be referred to the Committee on Claims and take the usual course?

Mr. MADDEN. I think it had no business on the bill, but the Senate put it on. We would not have put it on if it had been in the House.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. There are several claims similar to this one before the War Claims Committee, and I should like to know something about this, so we can form some judgment as to how to pass on these other claims, if this is going through without any consideration whatever.

Mr. MADDEN. On July 5, 1921, the Coast Guard cutter Manning, at about 7.30 a. m., collided with the schooner Alice May Davenport, while endeavoring to get alongside the pier at the entrance of the floating dry dock. The collision was due to a flood tide, limited space in which to maneuver, to the fact that the Manning handled badly, having but one boiler in use and a piece of hawser wrapped around her propeller, and that there was no tug available to hold the Manning's stern up against the tide while docking. The commanding officer of the Manning, Lieut. Commander P. H. Scott, was on the bridge and handling his vessel, and did his best to handle his vessel so as not to create damage. Evidently it was an accident that could not be avoided, and it was adjudicated by the department.

Mr. SNELL. Why should it go through in this way and be put on an appropriation bill, while other claims have to go through the regular channels?

Mr. MADDEN. I agree that it is very bad practice, and it would not have been put into the bill by the House, but it was a Senate item.

Mr. SNELL. The Senate continually do that, and I do not think we should allow those items here.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the gentleman from New York will appreciate the fact that this is the Christmas season. We have just made one Christmas gift of half a million dollars, and I trust the gentleman will not oppose this one of $110.

Mr. SNELL. I am simply expressing my opinion as to the impropriety of the practice.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In nearly all these cases the departments can settle claims under $500 caused by collision. I thought that applied to the Coast Guard as well. The Navy Department can settle such claims and I think the War Department can.

Mr. WALSH. No; not the War Department.

Mr. SNELL. The War Department informed me that they could not do it. There are three or four War Department claims before our committee now.

Mr. MANN. They have the authority and they settle a great many claims in the Engineer Department.

Mr. SNELL. We have half a dozen similar claims before the War Claims Committee now.

Mr. MANN. I may be mistaken as to the War Department.

Mr. SNELL. The Navy Department can settle claims up to $500, but the War Department state that they can not.

Mr. MANN. I secured the passage of the first bill on the subject, I think, for the Lighthouse Service. I think they have authority to settle such claims, and it ought to be so with all the departments.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me it would be better to do that rather than to bring a claim of $100 before Congress.

Mr. MANN. When a man has to come before Congress to get the settlement of a claim for $110 it is hard enough on him without resisting his claim when it is properly before the House.

Mr. SNELL. I agree to that. I simply would like to have some uniform plan followed as to all of them.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to say that while this is a small claim, it is a dangerous practice, a bad habit, and I do not think this item ought to go into the bill in this way.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree that it ought not to have been put on the bill, but it was put on in the Senate, and we had a lot of other matters to settle.

Mr. CHALMERS. Why can you not vote it out here in the House?

Mr. MADDEN. If we vote it out it will delay the passage of the bill, and, as has been explained before, it is important that the bill pass quickly.

I move that the House recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 29 and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. The next amendment is No. 30.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 30: On page 32, in line 12, strike out "$26,057,631.71" and insert "$26,074,741.71."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 30 and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 9237, the first deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1922, the Clerk be authorized and directed to strike out "present session," on page 17, line 24 of the engrossed bill, and insert in lieu thereof "first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in all other places of the bill this language appears, and this one item ought to be corrected in order to make the bill uniform.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an able and exhaustive address delivered last night before the Washington Chamber of Commerce by Gov. W. P. G. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, on the Federal reserve system as related to American business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8928, the reclassification bill.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 2, line 13, of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 2, line 13, of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last evening there was an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW]. Has that been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is correct. The gentleman from Illinois will postpone his request until the pending amendment is disposed of. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DARROW: On page 9, line 11, following the word "pharmacology," insert the word "pharmacy," followed by a comma.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a difference of opinion as to the meaning of the words "pharmacology" and "pharmacy." The committee thought that the combining of drugs, the study of drugs with relation to their effect on the human system, the use of drugs for the treatment of certain pathological conditions, was best described by the term "pharmacology," but it seems that in professional circles the term "pharmacy" is the one generally used. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will so modify his amendment as to strike out the word "pharmacology" and insert "pharmacy," I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the word "pharmacology" and inserting the word "pharmacy" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the modified amendment, as follows:

On page 9, line 11, strike out the word "pharmacology" and insert in lieu thereof the word "pharmacy."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The proposed substitute amendment shows the impracticability of the classification of scientists by grades as enumerated in this bill. It is proposed under the present law, if there happens to be some person who is a graduate of a school of pharmacy, a man who may be a high-school student and who has taken two or three years in a school of pharmacy, which qualifies him as a graduate of a college, and he happens to be at the head of a professional grade, he would get the minimum salary under the proposed change made by the gentleman from New Jersey yesterday of $5,400 and a maximum salary of $6,600. It is hard for me to conceive how a mixer of medicine would be entitled to even the minimum amount prescribed by the bill. I referred to this inconsistency and want of practical application in general debate. If you go through the bill you will see that it is unworkable, because you can not fix the salary of these professional men for all the sciences alike, grade them according to these grades and according to the general classification as here provided for. There are men in the department, heads of the Chemical Division of the Department of Agriculture, men in the Bureau of Standards, who may be entitled to $5,400, and even up to $6,000 or $6,600. It is possible that in the prohibition unit it may be necessary to employ a pharmacist to analyze blends. I do not know, but I think there is not a service except in the prohibition unit that would require it. Perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who comes from a city which has a most excellent school of pharmacy and has graduates throughout the country, can inform the committee in what department of the Government pharmacists will be employed entitled to the high salaries ranging from $5,400 to $6,600. Why, there are tens of thousands of graduates from the school of pharmacy who would be glad to fill these responsible positions for a salary of $2,500 or $3,000, yet here you are proposing to raise their salaries to $5,400 or $6,600.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How about the officer of the Government who works with others in making up the United States Pharmacopœia? Is not that a responsible position?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a responsible position, but I question whether to-day he is receiving anyway near the minimum salary here proposed. That is what I am protesting against. Under the terminology of pharmacists the high salary would not only go to this man, who is engaged in preparing the pharmacopœia, but would also go to others employed in the Agricultural Department or the prohibition unit, or in any other department of the Government. One man might be entitled to a high amount and another man might not, and that is the vice of this classification.

Mr. MANN. Probably the man would not get it if he is not entitled to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, it is mandatory. When this law is passed, and when the head of a department employs a man, if he occupies that position in grade 5 and does the work at the head of the bureau, he is entitled to the minimum salary; there is no escape from that.

Mr. MANN. If he is the head of the bureau that has to do with the making up of the pharmacopœia, he would have a responsible position.

Mr. STAFFORD. But there may be pharmacists employed by the Government who are not engaged in that high technical work of preparing the pharmacopœia, who under this schedule of salaries would be entitled to this high salary.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] had hermetically sealed not only his ears, but his brains, against any enlightenment as to what this bill purports to do or the plan and scheme under which the classifications are made. It is impossible for the ordinary pharmacist to hold any such position. If the gentleman would only read the bill understandingly he would know that it is impossible for the ordinary pharmacist employed in any office in the Government to get even the $3,000 which he said so many would be glad to receive. The gentleman said that the ordinary pharmacist would mandatorily receive from $5,400 to $6,600. Let us see who is entitled to that range of salary. I read from the bill, on page 11:

Positions in this service the duties of which are to act as technical and administrative heads of a major professional or scientific bureau.

There may be four or five in the entire Government who would receive that salary, and they would not receive any material increase over their present pay. But the gentleman from Wisconsin entirely perverts the plan and scope of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell me just how much the man who is performing the $7,200 job receives at the present time?

Mr. LEHLBACH. What $7,200 job?

Mr. SNELL. The last one provided for on page 11.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But there is no such place.

Mr. SNELL. I understand the gentleman has offered an amendment to reduce it to $6,600.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And the amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. I understand, but how much does the man occupying that position receive at the present time?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not know.

Mr. SNELL. I think that fact should be given to the Members of the House. I think we should know how much these men get now who fill these positions. What I am interested in is to know how much we are increasing the salaries. The gentleman just said there are only four or five who would get these high salaries. What are those men getting at the present time? With all of the gentleman's information—and I admit he understands his bill——

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman ought to be able to tell us what these men are getting.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I can not recall the specific salaries of the particular employees who would fill these grade 6 positions at the present moment. If I had a few moments I suppose I could refer to them.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. The Chief of the Bureau of Standards would be an example of an official who would come under grade 6 of the professional grade. He receives $6,000 under present law. The scale of salaries in grade 6, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] refers, begins at $5,400 and goes to as high as $6,600. The middle grade is $6,000. Therefore, the Chief of the Bureau of Standards when he is allocated will be placed in the middle grade and receive identically the salary that he now receives. The Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce is another example of officials who will fall in this grade 6. He also now receives $6,000 per annum and would go into the same classification as the Chief of the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What information came to the gentleman's committee after this bill was introduced on November 3 which led the committee to believe that the salaries fixed in the bill were too high, and to reduce them by the amendment which was adopted, and other amendments which will be proposed, by 10 per cent?

Mr. BLACK. I shall be very frank to answer that question. This salary schedule recommended by the Reclassification Committee was made up in March, 1920, when prices were at their highest peak. We all know that.

Mr. SNELL. Was this whole bill made up as far back as that?

Mr. BLACK. The report of the Reclassification Committee was submitted to Congress in March, 1920, with its salary recommendations. The Lehlbach bill followed the salary recommendations of the Committee on Reclassification, and that committee after a very careful analysis of all the jobs estimated that it would make an increased cost of about 8.5 per cent in the annual appropriations. To show that this estimate was in line with the facts, take the figures which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] put into the RECORD yesterday. Mr. Herbert D. Brown is the head of the Bureau of Efficiency.

I have no criticism to make of Mr. Brown. I think he is a competent, honest, able public servant, but it is admitted that he is not an advocate of the Lehlbach bill, and therefore would not submit any partial figures in its favor. He took the employees of the Treasury Department, with an annual expenditure of $34,000,000 at the present time for their salaries, which is about a third of the annual pay roll here in the District of Columbia, and using this Lehlbach bill, by careful, expert allocation, Mr. Brown estimates that if the salary schedules go into effect without amendment it will increase the pay roll of the Treasury Department slightly over $2,000,000, or an even 6 per cent. The committee takes the view that now is no time to add additional expenditures to the Government, not even an increase of 6 per cent. So it was the judgment of the committee that amendments should be prepared which would reduce the salary schedules to such an extent that the passage of the bill would not add to the aggregate expenditures of the Government over present costs. These amendments have been carefully prepared and I feel very sure will be adopted by the House.

Mr. SNELL. Right there, will the gentleman tell me how much you are adding by this bill?

Mr. BLACK. None whatever, assuming there are no separations from the service during the fiscal year——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. SNELL. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will yield further to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Assuming there are no separations from the service the first fiscal year this bill operates——

Mr. SNELL. Right there, is it not understood in Congress that we are going to have some separations from the service, that we are going to reduce the number of employees?

Mr. BLACK. Let me complete the statement, and then the gentleman can make whatever comment he chooses to make upon it. Assuming the same number of Government employees stay in the service—that is the only way you can make the calculation——

Mr. SNELL. I think that is true.

Mr. BLACK. There would be an increase even after the amended schedule is adopted of about 1½ per cent over the present aggregate. Assuming, however, there will be the normal separations from the service, the new employees will come in at the minimum salaries as provided by the bill, and that one item will absorb all of the increase. Therefore, I feel absolutely certain in my own mind that while this bill will in certain cases increase salaries and in certain other cases decrease them, and equalize the whole salary level, as we hope it will, that the aggregate expenditure for salaries will not be any more than it is now. On the contrary, if reductions in personnel are made which should be made, the expenditure should be less.

Mr. SNELL. Are the general provisions of this bill made up on conditions that existed in 1920?

Mr. BLACK. As I stated to the gentleman, we are making these reductions for the simple reason that we all know there has been a considerable decline in the cost of living, the burdens of the taxpayers are heavy, and the expenses of the Government should not be increased.

Mr. SNELL. Why did you not make the changes before November 3; what came up after November 3 which changed your mind?

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman wishes me to speak for the committee, I will say that the committee, after having heard the bill discussed in the House, after having been apprised of the sentiment of the House, thought it was nothing but the just thing to do to heed the sentiment thus expressed and comply with it.

Mr. SNELL. That is a good explanation and I like it.

Mr. BLACK. And we did not draw these amendments in a haphazard way, either. The committee sat almost two whole days going over carefully schedule by schedule, so as to work out these amendments in a just and equitable manner and with some system to it.

Mr. SNELL. If this general bill increases the efficiency, I think everybody is for it, but if it is going to tend to increase salaries, except in some special cases, I personally am very much opposed to it.

Mr. BLACK. It will even up salaries. I do not care to read what I have already read into the RECORD with reference to the present very unequal pay for equal work which prevails as to some of the Government departments. We have stated that in substance this bill will continue the present range of salaries of employees in general, including the $240 increase which was received since the beginning of the war, and as to some other employees who are receiving too much or too little there will be an evening-up process. That, in brief, is what we hope the bill will accomplish in addition to its methods of efficiency ratings for the future.

Mr. SNELL. So the employees will get the benefit of the bonus whether we continue it or not, is that the idea?

Mr. BLACK. No; there will be no more bonus. The bill does away with that altogether, and those who come into the service in the future will come in at the basic minimum rates.

Mr. SNELL. I mean the medium grades.

Mr. BLACK. If the bonus be continued the next fiscal year, then it will be a part of the compensation which the employee is receiving at the time he is allocated into a particular grade of one of the services provided for in the bill and will, of course, in that way effect his allocation.

I have endeavored to make that feature of the bill perfectly plain to the House in observations which I have already made.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking two questions. After quite an extended dissertation yesterday the gentleman from Texas started out with the assumption that he would prove very clearly that this bill did not carry any more money than to equalize the present salary charge; that there would not be an increase of salaries; but I understood him, after final questioning at the end of his speech, to admit that it would carry $10,000,000 more.

Mr. BLACK. No; the gentleman never heard me admit that on the floor of the House. The gentleman heard me admit this, that if the bill was passed unamended that it would increase the expenses approximately 8.5 per cent, and the present pay roll being something over $100,000,000, at 8.5 would amount to between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000; but if the gentleman was listening to what I said, and I am sure he was——

Mr. LAYTON. I was.

Mr. BLACK. But merely does not remember what I said for the time being. I stated this, that the committee had carefully worked out amendments which would be offered, and if adopted would not increase expenses to a greater extent than 2 per cent, assuming there were no separations from the service.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. Just a moment; I want to finish this. The gentleman admits, I understand now, that under the terms of this bill the bonus will be included.

Mr. BLACK. I never contended anything else, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. That is all I want of that.

On yesterday the chairman—I may be mistaken, but I so understood it on the discussion of the section relating to the bonus—when it was proposed to strike it out, claimed the bonus was not necessarily included in these salaries.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not in every salary.

Mr. LAYTON. Then all I have to say is that I will let the two gentlemen settle this discrepancy between them.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield until I make a complete answer?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. For instance, where the entrance salary at present is $900 and the bonus is $240, every new employee, of whom there are thousands coming into the service in the course of the year, starts at $1,140. After this reclassification takes effect they start at $1,080 instead of $1,140. So you see there is an example of where the salary is not the salary plus the bonus but is something less than the present initial salary. And that is the case in the entrance salaries of quite a number of grades. That will result in this, that, assuming the total number of employees is not reduced, the lower pay which the new entrants receive will equal such increases for the purpose of equalizing as the bill may make, so that there will be no general increase in the bill. Any reduction in force that may be made will inure to the benefit of the Treasury and actually reduce the cost of maintaining the civil service.

Mr. LAYTON. That any economy that will be had in this bill will depend upon the future entrants, so to speak, or those who are after this time initiated into the service? And then, as far as the present number on the pay roll is concerned, that does not apply?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Surely. But the bill further carries with it—and if it did not it would hardly be worth while bothering with—the opportunity of very largely reducing the personnel because of the increased efficiency which will result from a proper classification.

Mr. LAYTON. That, with all due respect to the gentleman, is an assumption.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Of course, it is an assumption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I presume I shall vote for this bill. I have expected to up to the present time, but I will not do it under any delusion. When a man goes into the service new now, he goes in at a low salary. Nobody enters the service of the United States at the top salary in these clerical positions or anything of that sort. He probably goes in at a lower salary than will be provided under this bill. So the entrants under this bill will not reduce the expense of the Government from the expense now. It strikes me that the real thing in this bill is the matter of promotion. There is often complaint that the Government has not increased its rates of pay for many years. But a man goes into the public service under the Government usually at a low grade, at a low salary, and he works his way up. The difficulty now is, in order to keep the best employees in the service, the way up is disturbed, has too many stumbling blocks, runs into a blind alley, and has no chance for an employee for promotion, except occasionally.

That was true in the Post Office Department, and we corrected it by automatic promotions. That was true in the police and fire departments in the District of Columbia, which probably was corrected by automatic promotions. This bill really provides for automatic promotions on efficiency ratings which we could control but which we will not. When the efficiency rating regulations are established and an employee of the Government conforms with those regulations and his efficiency ratings become so high that he is entitled to promotion of $100 a year, or whatever it may be, for the next year, he will get it. We will appropriate the money for it. I have no doubt that so far as the average pay of individuals is concerned, the expense will be greater under this bill than it is now. But it may be, and it is not at all unlikely, that the increased efficiency will more than pay the increased cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 2, lines 13 and 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 2, to the paragraph beginning on line 10 and ending on line 14. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman what his purpose is in returning?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. The other day there was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] in reference to the teachers under the board of education of the District of Columbia, placing them in a trade position instead of a profession.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman want to do?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I was waiting on the gentleman who first reserved the right to object.

Mr. MANN. I am doing so now.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I want to rescind the action.

Mr. MANN. You can not make such a motion. It is not in order. You can not move to reconsider in the Committee of the Whole. That is not in order. Now, the gentleman might just as well——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, can not the gentleman accomplish his purpose by voting down the amendment when we get into the House?

Mr. MANN. Yes; or if he can get unanimous consent he can vacate the action of the committee in agreeing to the amendment. That could be done just as well as by making the request now to return to it, and having to do it twice instead of once.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I make the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS] will state his request.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I want my colleague to state it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's request is that the committee vacate the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio on the page and line suggested, in reference to teachers, was agreed to, and that the amendment be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS] asks unanimous consent that the committee vacate the vote whereby certain amendments were agreed to in the paragraph covered by lines 10 to 14, inclusive, on page 2, and that the amendments be disagreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman consulted the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] moved his amendment it was under the influence of some officials connected with the educational system of the District of Columbia; and, apparently, these high officials, as I am informed, have changed front and no longer wish to be included in this classification bill. I assume that is the reason for the gentleman from Illinois making the request at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman think he is fair to the gentleman from Ohio? I thought he was absent, but I see that he is present, and he is amply able to take care of himself.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think I am fair to him, because the gentleman from Ohio is present and can speak for himself, and he is not opposed to this amendment because of the change of heart of the officials under the board of education.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is the gentleman fair to the gentleman from Ohio in saying that his action was controlled by the officials under the board of education? Should he not say it was inspired?

Mr. STAFFORD. I should say it was inspired by the school officials.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the other day, when I made that motion, I made it with serious intent, believing then, as I do now, that the school-teachers of the District should be paid on a par with common labor.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman does not mean that. He means higher.

Mr. BEGG. They are not paying them now as much as they pay the keeper of the morgue or the monkey-cage keeper. Those keepers are getting more than the school-teachers. I understand that the teachers are not averse to getting an increase of salary, as they would do under this bill, but they fear that some of their regulations regarding pay and tenure of office might be disturbed, and they prefer to take their chances on a separate bill, and on that ground I gave them assurance that I had no desire to wish on them something that they did not want, and I would be perfectly willing to have it effected if it can be done.

I do not think it is necessary to say anything more than that at this time. I do think there are some features of the proposition that ought to be corrected—and I say that most seriously—regarding the tenure of office.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Accordingly the proceedings whereby amendments were made to the paragraph referred to are vacated and the amendments are disagreed to. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUBPROFESSIONAL SERVICE.

The subprofessional service shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to perform work not requiring professional training, but incident, subordinate, or preparatory to work in the callings included in the professional service, and shall also include classes of positions the duties of which involve work in recreational, welfare, and other community activities.

Grade 1 shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to receive such instruction and perform such practical apprentice work as constitutes preparation for the examination for license or training for the trade or profession.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment concurrent resolutions of the following titles:

House concurrent resolution 38.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for the completion of the investigation by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry created by a Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress and the filing of the report to Congress therein directed to be made be, and the same is hereby, extended to a date not later than the 15th of April, 1922.

House concurrent resolution 39.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 9237 the first deficiency appropriation act, fiscal year 1922, the Clerk be authorized and directed to strike out "present session," on page 17, line 24, of the engrossed bill and insert in lieu thereof "first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9237) entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes."

Resolved, That the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to amendments of the Senate numbered 25, 26, and 27 to the said bill.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS WITHIN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have heretofore adopted subsection 1 of section 6 of this bill, which provides this:

That in computing the existing compensation of an employee any bonus which the employee receives shall be included.

Now, with that provision in the bill let us see what we are going to do, notwithstanding the fact that we are accepting a 10 per cent reduction here on the recommendation of the committee.

For instance, under grade 3 of the section that we are now considering the annual rates of compensation for positions in this grade shall be a minimum of $1,620 as printed in the bill, or $1,500 as recommended by the committee amendment, and shall range to the maximum salary of $1,920 as printed in the bill, or $1,800 as recommended by the committee amendment.

In the classification of these employees what are you going to do and how are you going to arrive at the grade in which they should be placed? Here are five separate, distinct grades in the one class, and in arriving at the grade to which you assign the employee you must take into consideration the $240 bonus as an element in arriving at that conclusion. That is provided by subsection 1 of section 3. Now, with employees at present in the departments, instead of starting them at $1,620 you are going to advance them to a higher grade, because you are required under this bill to reach your conclusion by considering first their salaries in connection with the $240 bonus that they are now receiving. I do not know—I wish I did know—but I heard the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], a member of the committee, say yesterday that if this bill is passed by the House as it was originally presented by the committee it will cost in the District of Columbia alone between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000; and I for one am unwilling to raise the salaries of this class of employees at this time, because conditions are changing, and inasmuch as this bill can not take effect until the fiscal year 1923, I think we had better proceed with the reclassification and leave salaries alone, because we know the cost of living is declining from day to day, and no man can tell what it will be twelve months or two years hence.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Knowing that these civil-service employees in the District, in the instances that the gentleman has mentioned, have received an increase of only $240, or less than 20 per cent on the average, and that we have permanently reclassified the postal employees so as to give them an average increase of about 35 per cent, I want to ask the gentleman if he advocates the repeal of the postal reclassification law and wishes to go back to the salary scale for postal employees which existed prior to the passage of that bill? If he does believe in that, why does he not introduce a bill to repeal the increased compensation to the postal employees? I could then see some consistency in the gentleman's position.

Mr. CLOUSE. I will say to the gentleman that the cases are not similar. In the first place, has the gentleman told the membership of this House whether these civil-service employees originally were overpaid and the employees of the Postal Service underpaid? If the gentleman would tell us about that, we would have some basis upon which to arrive at our conclusion in this case.

Mr. BLACK. I have given the gentleman the figures, and he can judge for himself. In June, 1920, Congress gave the postal employees an average increase of 35 per cent. I have heard no one advocating its repeal. Certainly the pending bill is written along as conservative and reasonable lines as was the postal reclassification bill.

Mr. CLOUSE. I have looked at the figures, and what I am saying is that, notwithstanding the committee recommends a decrease of 10 per cent in almost all instances, you are going to put these employees in a class where they will still get the 20 per cent increase of $240 a year, and that is inevitable from the reading of your own bill. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment pending be voted on at the conclusion of 10 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. I want five minutes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. At the conclusion of 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas). The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment shall close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, during the general debate on this bill I pointed out that the chief clerks of departments received an increase of something like 60 to 70 per cent under the bill as reported. The chief clerks in the departments to-day receive $2,500. Under the bill as reported they were to be raised from $2,500 to a minimum of $3,300 and a maximum of $4,020. Now it is proposed to increase their salaries from $2,940 to a maximum of $3,660. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has correctly stated that when this bill goes into effect it will result in all of the officials, if they have the proper efficiency, going to the maximum grade. The statistics on which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] and the committee base their conclusion that there will be an increase of only 1½ per cent is predicated upon the assumption that it is intended to continue the bonus to all those who have been receiving it during the past several years.

There is a radical divergence of opinion in this House as to whether this lump-sum allowance of $240 to every clerk in the District of Columbia is merited and should be continued.

Permit me to call the attention of the House to the gross amount of appropriation that is required for the $240 bonus. In 1920, when the $240 bonus went into effect, the total appropriation required was in the neighborhood of $29,000,000. In 1921 it rose to $69,000,000 as the result of the action of the Secretary of the Navy in giving the bonus, against the intention of Congress, to all the naval employees in the various navy yards of the country. In 1922 it is estimated that the amount will be from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000. At the present time there are 63,638 employees in the District of Columbia, receiving an average pay of $101,594,000. In the District government there are 5,730 employees, receiving a total pay of $8,931,000, or a total of $110,526,000. Based upon the increase, as this bill was introduced, of 8½ per cent of the total increase, the charge on the Public Treasury would amount to $9,374,000.

I stated before this amendment was proposed that the bill would entail a charge on the Treasury in three years of $20,000,000 additional to the $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 now paid them under the bonus. Here is my basis for making the charge: If the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN's, position is correct—and that is the position I have taken throughout the entire discussion—the salaries will be raised to the maximum. The estimate of percentage increase is based on the medium salary, not on the maximum, and there is an average difference of $200 or $300 between medium-grade salary and the higher. If you multiply the number of employees by 300 you have the enormous sum, if they reach the maximum, of $19,000,000 additional. And then the chairman of the committee says that I am making a wild statement when I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill will perpetuate a charge on the Government by continuing the bonus of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, and in its modified form will increase the maximum amount $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 more in the course of a few years after the bill has been in force and the clerks raised to the maximum amount.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the gentleman to say that the pay of the chief clerk in executive departments was $2,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman is absolutely in error, as he is in many other of his statements. The chief clerk of the Interior Department, of the Treasury Department, the Post Office Department, the War Department, to my certain knowledge, now gets $4,000 each.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will stand corrected. I was speaking of grade 6, private secretaries to members of the Cabinet. Inadvertently I said chief clerks of the departments. I do say that the private secretaries, grade 6, to members of the Cabinet receive $2,500.

Mr. BLACK. That is true, but they are not in grade 7.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was referring to grade 6.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any limitation on the number of clerks that can be promoted to the highest grade?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is one of the defects of this bill. We are surrendering completely the control over the determination of the number of clerks that will be allocated, because it will be impossible hereafter, except by lump-sum appropriations, to control the expenditure of the amount of money necessary for the respective grades. It is no longer intended to have a legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with provision for a stated number of clerks in respective grades, but merely to have lump-sum appropriations for the various grades. It is a matter of legislative impossibility for the House to control it, except by checking the amount required for the total appropriations.

Mr. BUTLER. The number of clerks that may be promoted to the highest grade will depend upon the administrative officer?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. And the gentleman thinks that they will all be promoted to the higher grades?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under supervision and recommendation of the Civil Service Commission and the Budget Commission.

Mr. BUTLER. Then it will cost twice as much as the gentleman states, and I believe he figures $19,000,000. If they are all promoted to the highest grade it will break up the Treasury. [Laughter.] I want to vote for the bill, but there ought to be somebody who can give us something definite in the way of the amount involved in the increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I am in error in assuming that there is a difference of between $200 or $300 in the salary paid in the medium grades and the maximum grade, I wish to be corrected. I have scanned the bill, and if you place it at $200 and there are 63,000 employees, that will make over $12,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. But we are not going to have 63,000 employees; get administrative officers that will reduce them.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are being reduced in number, but you will have to have employees.

Mr. BUTLER. But not as many as we had during the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. The primary objection to the bill is that we yield up the control over grades and salaries and leave it to the heads of departments subject to supervision of the Civil Service Commission and the Budget. The Budget will not have much to do with it, because its duties cover such a range, and it will be impracticable to go into the details of bureau and division requirements.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am asking for information. I have heard what seems to be more guesses on this bill than any bill that I have ever heard discussed. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to say that in his opinion, if this becomes a law it will increase the burden of taxation by raising the salaries of these employees to the extent of $19,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not immediately; but, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, the tendency will be to raise salaries to the highest grade. We all know what the tendency will be; it will be for the department heads and bureau chiefs, if the clerks have efficiency, to raise them to the maximum grade.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] contends that it will not raise them a cent. Therefore, I want to know who is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Texas will not dispute the statement that the revised figures are based upon the salaries in the medium grades.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman heard my statement. Assuming that the same number of employees are allocated, with the original allocations in the bill, this will not increase the present expenditure more than 2 per cent, and with the separations from the service it will not cause any increase at all. I have not contended, of course, that promotions in the future will not add some additional expense.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am pointing out how we are surrendering entire control, after having pursued a policy for years and years of having the Congress, through the Committee on Appropriations, control the number of clerks in the various grades. We are surrendering control so that we will virtually have lump-sum appropriations in these various grades in the various departments.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It would not be possible to do it in any other way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Practically not. I want to submit this one fact: Who are the Members on this floor who are opposing this bill? All who are opposing it have had from 4 to 6 to 8 or 10 years' experience in the framing of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], and myself. We all realize what this means. It is not a pleasant task to get up and call the attention of the committee to what it is. But each of us has a duty to perform of acquainting the membership with the special information gained from service on the legislative subcommittee on salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the committee. It proposes to reduce the salaries originally submitted by the committee. On yesterday I stated the grounds for my opposition to the amendment of the committee so far as the professional service was concerned. The same grounds hold good for the other services of the Government. In this case we are dealing with the clerical service, the employees of which constitute almost 60 per cent of the entire service. When the committee strikes at that branch of the service it strikes at 60 per cent of the employees who receive almost nominal salaries.

Mr. SNELL. And a great many of them vote.

Mr. LONDON. So far as the vote is concerned, I do not care much for it. The vote of the Government employee is usually an intimidated vote, and he votes with the party in power. That is one of the reasons I object to low salaries—salaries which destroy manhood, which destroy the faith of the man in his ability to earn a livelihood, which destroy to a large extent his self-respect.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to know, if that is so, if these salaries are destroying the manhood of these folks, why it is that I have never yet been able in the five years I have been here to find anyone from my district who wanted to quit one of these places.

Mr. BUTLER. And the gentleman will never find one unless he is fired.

Mr. LONDON. There is no doubt that there hang about politicians men who do not want to work, and taking their Congressman as a glaring example they believe they should get something for nothing. Of course, I am making no personal reference to the gentleman from Illinois. There is no doubt that the ordinary Congressman has around him a host of men called ward heelers or ward loafers, but I am not speaking on their behalf.

I am speaking on behalf of the men who work, who render service. I have before me a scholarly analysis of the minimum standards of living, prepared by various wage boards within recent times, and none of these standards of living, taking the minimum necessary for the existence of a human being in any degree of comfort, but is higher than the salaries you pay to the great majority in the clerical service. Deflation should not begin with the worker. He is not inflated. He is neither too fat nor too rich. As I pointed out yesterday, the cost of living is at least 70 per cent higher than it was in 1914. And, mind you, all of these so-called scientific standards are based on a nominal allowance for education, for recreation, for health, for insurance, for civic activities. They confine themselves almost exclusively to the things necessary to maintain the physical being, such as food, clothing, rents, allowing only a nominal sum for the activities of a civilized human being.

A great deal has been said about the failure of the committee to furnish the House with definite figures. The trouble is that Members do not study the material they have. Here is material in which gentlemen will find the exact figures. It is part 2 of the report of the Congressional Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries, in which every salary is indicated. The commission shows that the increase, the highest possible increase, would be 8.6 per cent. The Bureau of Efficiency, according to the figures submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], an opponent of this measure, shows that the increase would be only 6 per cent. The committee by reducing the salaries originally proposed in the bill by 10 per cent actually reduces the salaries paid to-day. I am opposed to this reduction. I am opposed to all the other reductions which the committee has announced it intends to propose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In case maintenance is provided, the annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $900, $960, and $1,020; in case maintenance is not provided, the annual rates shall be $1,320, $1,380, $1,440, and $1,500.

Grade 6 shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are, under the direction of a physician, to supervise the nursing work in an assigned part of a hospital; to perform important supervisory housekeeping work in institutions or other Government establishments.

In case maintenance is provided, the annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this service shall be $1,080, $1,140, and $1,200; in case maintenance is not provided, the annual rates shall be $1,620, $1,740, and $1,860.

Grade 7 shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are to direct the entire nursing and attending staff in a hospital or to direct the nursing work in a large administrative unit; to supervise large institutions or other Government establishments as superintendent, manager, or other administrative head.

In case maintenance is provided, the annual rates of compensation shall be $1,740, $1,920, and $2,100; in case maintenance is not provided, the annual rates shall be $2,580, $2,760, and $2,940.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. In my time I want to ask the chairman of the committee when he expects to get a vote upon the bill, as nearly as he can say?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, it is my hope that this bill may come to a vote this afternoon. There is a very appreciable number of Members who must leave town this afternoon who are very desirous of an opportunity of casting their votes for or against this measure. It is to accommodate them that I am trying, if possible, to complete the reading of the bill, in order to reach a vote this afternoon. I think the bill and its effect and the things connected with it have been so thoroughly debated that much more debate will not be necessary.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I was hoping there would be a vote upon the bill this afternoon. At the same time I am one of those who have to leave this evening and will not be back until after the holidays. I do not know whether it will reach a vote before I leave or not. I intended to vote for the bill if a vote is reached before I leave, and if not I have arranged for a pair. I hope we will get to a vote for it. I am in favor of the passing of the bill and would be glad to vote for it if I were here. While I am on my feet I do not know whether the legislative program as arranged by the leader will be carried out or not. I understood the antilynching bill was supposed to come up before the holiday adjournment. If it does, of course, having to be away I can not be here to vote on that bill. My intention would be to vote for the bill if here. If the bill comes up before the holidays, of course I can not vote for it, and I have arranged a pair with another Member who is going away with me and who is against the bill and would vote against it. I would vote for it if I were here.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to call the attention of this committee to a danger that is perfectly patent to me by reason of the experience I have had as chairman of the legislative committee. Until the war broke, practically the clerical service in the District of Columbia was upon the statutory roll, the salaries being fixed by statute. Because of the great necessity for additional employees in all the departments, and in a lot of new departments which were created by reason of the war emergency, lump-sum appropriations amounting to millions and millions of dollars each year were made. Out of the lump-sum appropriations the various departments began competition against each other for clerks and technical men, and they were going from place to place in obedience to the increased price offered here, there, and yonder. The result was a demoralization of the clerical service in the District of Columbia from which we are suffering now. Now, we are seeking to perpetuate that character of business in this bill. No one will ever know the amount of waste that was incurred by reason of the unfortunate lump-sum appropriations. As long as Congress keeps its hands upon the button and fixes the amount of appropriation of each department in accord with the statutory positions there we have some way of knowing the amount of public expenditures for civil-service work, but when we have no control over it, and, if you please, wages are left to the parceling out by the heads of these institutions under this or any other character of bill, human nature is the same as it was yesterday and will be forever, and the tendency will be, especially in the administration of governmental affairs, toward waste. Now, the calculations that have been made here have not taken into consideration what the possible result would be in the event that the maximum salaries may be paid. The maximum, you may rest assured, will be paid. If not in the first year of the administration of this affair it will be paid very soon thereafter.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for an explanation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The Post Office Department have a classification. Do they all go to the highest grades?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is a fine example. They do not do it, and I will tell the gentleman why. They were classified by Executive order under the Bureau of Efficiency, where men in the Post Office Department to-day are rendering more service for the amount of money paid than in any other department of this Government, because their work is defined, and the man who does the work within the definition gets a certain pay, and the appropriation is made in accord to that.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Just one more. Why can not the provisions of this bill hold them down to the same standard of administration as the Post Office Department?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will tell the gentleman why: Because the range they have made from the minimum here to the maximum—it is the easiest matter in the world for a clerk either through his own persuasive powers or through the influence of some gentleman up here on the hill who wants to see him promoted—to get him into the maximum, and I will tell the gentleman why.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK. The reason I asked the gentleman to yield is because I think he misunderstood the question of the gentleman from West Virginia. I think the gentleman from West Virginia, when he said clerks in the Post Office Department, employees, meant those in the field service, such as letter carriers, postal clerks, and so forth.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The entire Postal Service.

Mr. BLACK. They do get automatic promotions. The man who starts in grade 1 in the year 1921, then, will go the next following year into grade 2, and he will go the next following year into grade 3, and so forth, and the appropriations are automatic and not upon an efficiency rating. Now, as a matter of fact, this bill is a decided improvement upon it, because no clerk by this bill has the right to an automatic promotion. He has no right to get a promotion at all unless he shows a certain efficiency rating. Now, that is not true of the Post Office Department, and if he stays in the service he is automatically promoted.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is it not true there are always a large number in the lower grades in the Post Office Department?

Mr. BLACK. If they are, they are in the new places, because the law provides for automatic promotions in the Postal Service.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to call the attention of this committee to some experience we have had that absolutely proved beyond peradventure the danger of this character of legislation.

Since these lump-sum appropriations have been made and since it has occurred with each recurrent legislative bill that they were abusing them and paying out of all proportion the money in large salaries, limitations have been put upon each one of these departments that has a lump-sum appropriation, providing that they could not pay beyond a certain amount of money to more than a certain number of positions. In that way they have been kept in check, and each time they come back insisting that they can not run the department unless they have more high-priced men, each time trying to convey the idea that if their department has to function and render the best service they must have many additional high-priced men, reaching a maximum, and they have raised the maximum price. I call attention to one or two concrete examples which will show you what will happen under this sort of a reclassification bill.

You take the Department of Health. There is not a doctor in that department that would think about serving for less than $5,000 or $6,000 a year. Prior to the time we entered the war we had surgeons in every soldiers' home hospital of high repute, many of them with reputations extending far beyond their own States for their extraordinary ability, and there was not one of them that was receiving in excess of $3,000. The Department of Health came along, augmented and magnified by reason of the war, and they boosted these salaries up to $9,000 a year, or, at least, many of them to $7,500, and the result was they went away from the soldiers' homes. Those who stayed by the old jobs insisted that they should have salaries somewhere in proportion to the other salaries. As a result, they were increased $600, and they are getting $3,600.

They also increased by more than 50 per cent the pay of nurses in the various hospitals, and the result was that we had to increase the pay of the nurses in these soldiers' home hospitals and likewise the attendants. And so this furnishes a concrete example of what will be done when they have no check upon them except the highest maximum. So you can depend upon it that instead of setting the average of what the gentleman says the outlay will be, it will be practically what it is now. He does not take into consideration, or will not for a moment contend, if the maximum is reached or anywhere near approached, but what the additional expenditures will be increased to the Government many millions of dollars.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I agree with what the gentleman says about the lump-sum appropriations, but what is his remedy for it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My remedy for it is simply this, to fix it exactly like it was done in the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Fix it exactly like it was done in the Post Office Department. And I want to say to you now that nine-tenths of all the abuse that was heaped on Postmaster General Burleson's head came because of the fact that he was trying to get some efficiency in the Post Office and in getting a dollar's worth of work for a dollar's worth of money. The Bureau of Efficiency went in there under Executive order. It was the only place it did go under Executive order, and they defined the work to be done and then fixed the pay in accordance with that work. It resulted, if you please, in the reduction of some 30 or 40 men that were being overpaid. It resulted in promotion of several that were being underpaid, but immediately when those gentlemen were demoted the trouble began, and then criticism began to be hurled against Gen. Burleson and the Bureau of Efficiency, and they have been poison droppers from that day to this. I will say to the gentleman that whenever you give into the keeping of the heads of any of these departments the lump-sum appropriation you can depend upon it it is not going to be spent for the best interests of the Government or of efficiency. It never has been in the past and never will be. There is not a man upon the Appropriation Committee but that knows that this lump-sum appropriation has been a curse, and it has been the labor of the committee to try to check it, and the only way they have found to check it is by putting a limitation upon the salaries that may be paid out of it and on the number of high-priced men that may be engaged under it.

Mr. BUTLER. Can we not do it here?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; we can not do it here.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, no one can be more desirous of denouncing the inequalities, the extravagances, and the unbusinesslike administration of the affairs of the Government under the lump-sum system than I. It was for the very purpose of eliminating those evils that it was first proposed the entire service be reclassified. It never has been completely classified. No one, by taking up an estimate either from a department that employs statutory employees or from a department that has its appropriations provided by lump sum, can tell by looking at the estimate of appropriations asked for what the people to be appropriated for are actually doing in the service. There are in the old estimates about 2,000 pay-roll titles. There are as many as 17 different titles for the same work that is being done in the various departments, and there are salary ranges for the same identical work of from $1,080 to $2,400, for exactly the same work, under the present system.

Now, how are you going to cure it? The gentleman from Indiana says the only way you can do it is by putting a limitation on the lump sum, saying you shall not employ more than so many men at $2,000 or more than so many men at $3,000. That is a pitiful confession that Congress can not introduce businesslike methods in the business of the Government. The way to do it is to classify all the different kinds of work to be done for the Government. Take your professional men, your subprofessional men; here is your clerical force; here is your custodial force, your institutional force, and, in the District here, is your police force, your fire force, and your inspectional force.

They all do, on broad lines, the same kind of work. Now, they do different grades of work within that service. There is your top man in charge, and then there at the very bottom of the custodial service, we will say, are the charwomen. Then there are the people who under immediate supervision do the simplest kind of clerical work. Then we have people who do expert clerical work. We have heads of divisions and of rooms, and we have bureau chiefs and we have private secretaries. The way to do is to classify the service, examine the quality of the work to be done and the necessary qualifications of the individuals to perform that work. Compare it; consider present conditions; consider all the elements and then fix a fair average salary range for that work, for that grade and that position, and then you have a situation where no head of a department, no bureau chief, can pay any employee of the Government whatsoever one penny more than the salary fixed by the Congress itself for that grade and that service.

That is what we intend to do in this bill. Then you do away with lump-sum appropriations. Your estimates will come in here, "We need so many people in grade 1, in grade 2, and in grade 3," or "We need so many in grades 4 or 5." Then the Committee on Appropriations can intelligently scan that estimate, knowing the quality and kind of work that each man in that grade shall perform, and they can tell whether the department actually needs that number of employees or not, and they can revise the estimates. No bureau or division or department can have more people in grade 4 of the clerical service or grade 5 or grade 3 of the clerical service than Congress says they shall have, and Congress can then intelligently say how many they should have, because for the first time Congress will know what these people that are asked for are supposed to do.

Now, my friends, so far as increasing pay is concerned, every single year when the appropriation bills come in there are requests for promotions in this department, and in that bureau, or in that service, and so on, and Congress says, "We will appropriate the money for 20 of these promotions," or "We will cut off 20," and so forth. Now, who gets these promotions? There is nothing to govern, no rules or regulations, but simply the whim of the superior, and, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] says, political influence very frequently enters into the question as to who gets the promotion, whether it is deserved by quality of work or not.

In our bill we say that all these advances must be on the basis of fitness and efficiency ratings, which are examinable and which can be understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersay has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Now, another thing about the lump-sum appropriation system that the gentleman from Indiana has spoken of. That is the competition between two departments, where the employees are given a higher inducement, as, for example, by the Public Health Bureau, where doctors are offered a higher salary than they are getting in the service where they now are, and they are thus taken away. We know where stenographers at $1,000 and $1,100 in the departments were taken away by the War Risk Insurance Bureau and paid $1,800 and $2,000, and we attempted to check that by prohibiting transfers from a department to a new service that had a lump-sum appropriation.

What we try to do throughout this bill is to see to it that the people employed shall have equal pay for equal work, and that there will be no inducement for one department to get an employee away from another department, because it can not offer him a higher salary, because people doing the same work will get the same pay throughout the service.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. As I recall the Post Office appropriation bill, for example, appropriations were made for so many people of so many classes. Will we do the same thing under this bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Hereafter, when the estimates are submitted, they will be for so many clerks of a certain grade, and so on?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. It will absolutely do away with lump-sum appropriations, so far as the personnel of the civil service is concerned.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to get a little more information from the chairman of the committee in regard to this bonus proposition. It is not clear in my mind. When you say you are not increasing salaries, do you mean you are providing by statute for these employees, or with the bonus at the present time?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Over present compensation, which includes the bonus.

Mr. SNELL. Then if we vote for this bill it means a continuation of the bonus forever, regardless of what future conditions may be?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not in so far as the lower grades and the entrance figures for some of the grades are concerned; but generally speaking, for the body of the personnel now in the service, we are absorbing the bonus.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think that if that was made clear to the membership of this House, and they actually understood it, they would vote for that bonus forever? That has never been made clear to me until this very moment, that that is what the conditions are.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Before the bonus was granted the salaries were grossly inadequate. From 1913 up to the present time the increase in the cost of living is still 55 per cent, and the bonus is only 20 per cent. In the Postal Service and in the police force and in the fire department, and in the schools to the teachers, and in other services that may not for the moment come to my mind, we have permanently increased the salaries from 35 to 40 per cent. In view of those facts we are absorbing the 20 per cent increase here. I will say to the gentleman from New York that, as far as I am concerned, we can never go back to the proposition of asking a girl to come from anywhere in this country to the city of Washington and subsist here and be decent and work for $900 a year. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. That is not the question I am asking at all. What I am asking is that it be made clear that this is perpetuating the bonus forever. That has never been made clear before in this debate.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, yes.

Mr. SNELL. I have never understood it before.

Mr. LEHLBACH. In a debate lasting for at least an hour or more on section 6 that question was dealt with exhaustively.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I am decidedly opposed to striking out the two words which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] moved to strike out, and therefore I think I am entitled to the floor to ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] a question. If this bill becomes a law, does the gentleman anticipate that Congress will be asked hereafter to vote a bonus of $240 on top of the figures provided in this bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Absolutely not.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, this is simply an increase in salary?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. But it is not as much as the bonus in some instances?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. I want it understood that I am not going to vote for any more bonuses if this bill passes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman provides the bonus forever if this bill passes.

Mr. BUTLER. No; it is an increase of salary. You may call it what you please, but nevertheless it is an increase of salary. We have been voting the bonus from year to year, but this makes a permanent increase.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania understands that the salaries which the employees of the Government will receive under this bill will not include the bonus in any case unless Congress provides the bonus in its next annual appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER. So that we will have a chance to vote on it again. I thank the gentleman very much. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTODIAL SERVICE.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee in charge of the bill I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment:

CUSTODIAL SERVICE.

Grade 2: Strike out "$1,080, $1,140, $1,200, and $1,260," and insert "$1,080, $1,140, and $1,200."

Grade 3: Strike out "$1,320, $1,380, and $1,440," and insert "$1,260, $1,320, and $1,380."

Grade 4: Strike out "$1,500, $1,560, and $1,620," and insert "$1,440, $1,550, and $1,560."
Grade 5: Strike out "$1,680, $1,740, $1,800, $1,860, $1,920, $1,980, and $2,040," and insert "$1,560, $1,620, $1,680, $1,740, $1,800, $1,860, and $1,920."
Grade 6: Strike out "$2,160, $2,280, $2,400, $2,520, and $2,640," and insert "$1,980, $2,100, $2,220, $2,340, and $2,520."
Grade 7: Strike out "$2,760, $2,880, and $3,000," and insert "$2,520, $2,640, and $2,760."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has been repeatedly stated, and I take it for granted that the statement is correct, that in the original bill, before any of these amendments were offered, the salaries proposed were taken from the report of the committee upon reclassification, and that their recommendation in each instance was adopted, so that the salaries in the original bill were the salaries proposed by the reclassification committee.

Now, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, at the time the reclassification committee made its investigation we were at the peak of the high cost of living, and they made these recommendations influenced by the then high cost of living to the civil-service employees.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman permit me for one minute?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. They used the figures of 1919, and the increase in the cost of living did not reach the peak until 1920.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is exactly what I am saying.

Mr. LONDON. These figures are lower than the figures of the peak of the high cost of living.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The proponents of this bill knew that they were fixing permanent salaries, but by reason of these suggestions and amendments we have been successful, and not only have amendments been made, but if it had not been for the little recess we had in the consideration of this bill they would not have been made. Now they are admitting that the cost of living has been reduced practically 50 per cent.

Mr. LONDON. Oh, no.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman from New Jersey said a few moments ago there had been that reduction from the time this salary list was originally gotten up down to to-day. If that is true, if it is still abnormal, why does this body of so-called intelligent men want to add to the list of salaries for these civilian positions?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The committee does not regard the schedule of salaries as abnormal.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. You must admit that if they are not abnormal, if they are normal to-day, they will become abnormal if you reduce the 50 per cent of abnormalcy in the high cost of living. You may take either horn of the dilemma you please—it is either too low or it will be too high when you get back to normalcy.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish the gentleman would answer a question and take the kinks out of my mind. I have had more trouble connected with this bill than with any other since I have been a Member of the House. I do not want the authority taken from the House to deal with the number of clerks or the salaries. We will still have them appear before the Committee on Appropriations, and to keep the number of employees in a distinct grade. I want to ask the gentleman a question because he has thought it out very well: Do not we still have authority to fix the number of employees in the different grades as we do under the Post Office bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is no doubt that under this bill Congress would have the right to limit the number of employees and to increase or decrease them, but here is the trouble. You take any one of the classifications with the range of salaries; here is one that provides a range of salary from $1,680 to $2,040, and here is where we are going to slip up. We are going to let loose our hold on raising a salary from $1,680 to $2,040. Never again will you pass upon that thing.

Mr. BUTLER. Can not you say so many clerks in this grade——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but you can not say how many shall receive such a salary, except between the top and bottom range.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. We adopted an amendment which says that nobody can get an increase from one grade to the next without the approval of Congress and an explicit appropriation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Then why all the machinery of allocation and reallocation and for promotion and demotion?

Mr. LEHLBACH. To make it more uniform and fair and get rid of the hodgepodge that we have to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman is correct now with reference to the contention he is making, we have got the first part of the bill, two-thirds of it, defining duties that shall be performed by the Civil Service Commission and the budget and by this and that, with reference to the allocation of these people to different grades. Why put that in if Congress has this power?

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. After having adopted such an amendment, I call attention to page 6 where it is provided that for such appropriations by Congress the provision shall be sufficient. Does not that do away with the amendment because it is subsequent?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely. Now, I am not accusing the committee and I would not believe it of the committee if I accused them of it myself—I would not accuse these gentlemen of trying to delude Congress, but there is not a single man who can read this bill from start to finish and then state that he is satisfied with it because there are so many inconsistencies in it. You are saying in one place that the Congress of the United States shall say when and where a man shall be promoted, and in a half a dozen other places you say that this or that authority shall promote him.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. How are promotions in the service made to-day?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are made at the recommendation of the heads of the departments.

Mr. LEHLBACH. How are they made under the classification bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. As I say, within these ranges.

The time of Mr. WOOD of Indiana having expired, he was given two minutes more by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Here is what happens now, and although bad as it is, it is much better than what you propose: Under the present arrangement they come before the Committee on Appropriations and ask to have so many clerks in class so-and-so, and it is intimated that there is a promotion in it, and the committee has the right to inquire why the promotion is being made. You will never get a chance to do that under this bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Every person entering the service enters at the bottom salary after the allocations have been made, and then promotions can not be made except upon the basis of fitness, and those are revised and subject to the approval of the Committee on Appropriations and Congress. The only difference between the present system and the proposed system is that the recommendations must be fairly made instead of on whim.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, Congress has a right, and it has taken three-fourths of the time of the committee on the legislative bill to inquire into why they are attempting to promote such and such a man. Congress will have no right to do that, for there is nothing in this bill that requires them to come to Congress and render an account of their promotions. Just as long as they keep within the maximum and the minimum grade they are a law unto themselves and monarchs of all they survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] either misunderstood or did not hear the question I asked. He said that we based the salaries which we recommended upon the report of the commission.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what the chairman says.

Mr. LONDON. That is true, and that the commission based its estimates on the cost of living in 1920. Let us see. The commission prepared the schedules some time at the end of 1919.

The only available figures they had then were the figures for June, 1919. Let us compare the figures of June, 1919, with those of September, 1921. We find that in Boston the total increase of the cost of living, as compared with 1914, was, in June, 1919, 72.8 per cent, and that in September, 1921, it was 72.8 per cent. In Detroit it was 84.4 per cent in June, 1919, and it is 88 per cent now. In New York it was 78.2 per cent in June, 1919, and 79.7 to-day, so that there is really no difference between the cost of living of June, 1919, and the cost now, when we are called upon to vote on the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Do you not think, then, because of the figures that you have given, that this is a very poor time in which to fix statutory salaries?

Mr. LONDON. Then it must be borne in mind that as compared with 1914 you are 72 per cent behind. Gentlemen must admit that in 1914 we were paying these miserable Government clerks 72 per cent more than they were entitled to or that we are not paying the proper salary to-day. It is one or the other. We can not get away from that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not want to make a misstatement. It has been admitted here and stated time and time again that the legislative committee in reporting the legislative bill had provided for additional positions in the higher grades, $1,400, $1,600, $1,800, in order to provide for the promotion of these worthy clerks. That has been the rule from time immemorial. Of course, the gentleman has not been on that committee and is not aware of that fact.

Mr. LONDON. I know that all the wisdom and all the knowledge and all of the logic of the House of Representatives is lodged in the four Members who have been on the legislative committee. I do not know what proportion of that wisdom is lodged with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], but I assume that he has a just proportion of it. I shall not dispute that proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is now getting away from his line of thought.

Mr. LONDON. That is true. The gentleman from Indiana says that now is not a time to fix permanent salaries. Then do not pass any bill. I do not expect any substantial change in the cost of living for the next 10 or 15 years. The world has been so badly upset by that scourge of humanity—war—that it can not come to itself for a generation. Gentlemen should not make any mistake about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with these salaries I want to get a little information, if I can. Section 3 of the bill provides for the allocation of positions of those now in the service to the appropriate grades in the compensation schedule, and that the head of the department shall fix the rate of compensation of each employee in the department in accordance with the rules prescribed in section 6. Section 6 provides that if an employee is receiving compensation less than a minimum salary of the grade or division in which his duties fall, the compensation shall be increased to the minimum rate, and if he is receiving compensation within the range of salary prescribed for the appropriate grade, he shall be advanced to the next higher grade. Suppose he is getting more? I have heard the statement made here several times that different employees of the Government in different departments of the Government, doing exactly the same work, receive different rates of pay; that one may get $1,000 or $1,100 and another $2,000 or $2,500, and one gentleman went as far as to say it went as high as $3,300, all doing the same work. There is no provision in section 6 with reference to that. When the head of a department allocates these men in the different departments, what salaries are to be given to the men who get the highest salary?

Mr. BLACK. In accordance with section 3 it must be within the salary range of the grade to which he is allocated. Inasmuch as there happens to be no specific rule for the guidance of the department head, I presume that he must exercise his judgment, but he must reduce his employees to some salary within the grade.

Mr. MANN. Then the salary must be reduced in some cases?

Mr. BLACK. It must be.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to ask any improper question, but why was not that put in the bill? The bill refers to an increase but says nothing about a decrease.

Mr. BLACK. I was looking for the Sterling bill, and I thought I had it here.

Mr. MANN. That does not interest me.

Mr. BLACK. I was going to call attention to a provision in the Sterling bill which was originally in this bill when first considered which covered that sort of case.

Mr. MANN. Did not that say that there should be no reduction.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. We struck that from the bill, and the committee thought that the bill was sufficient to make it certain that an employee in that class would be allocated to the grade nearest his compensation, but reduced in salary. The committee has no objection, so far as I am concerned, if that is not clear, to an amendment that he shall be allocated to not a greater salary than the maximum of the grade.

Mr. MANN. Well, I could not see, I am frank to say, why you should provide for every case specifically except where there might be a reduction and say nothing about it in such case.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It was the unqualified judgment of the committee or the intention of the committee that such a reduction be made in such case; but I would be glad to prepare an additional amendment under section 6 that will specifically take care of it or will be glad to accept such an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have not prepared anything. I should think it might be very difficult for a head of the Agricultural Department and the head of the Treasury Department if they have two men performing practically the same service, and one of them is now getting $1,100 a year and the other $2,200 a year, to arrange the matter unless there is a law on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment which I have previously offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LEHLBACH: Committee amendment to the amendment. Amend the amendment by adding to salaries in grade 2, "Provided, That charwomen working part time be paid at the rate of 40 cents an hour and head charwomen at the rate of 45 cents.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, it was thought that possibly by not mentioning charwomen, this bill dealing entirely with permanent employees, they might come within the classification of cleaners that have permanent employment, and it is to make clear that is not the intention, but to establish what is now the rate, that this amendment is offered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $4,200, $4,500, $4,800, and $5,100.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois: Page 25, line 13, after the semicolon, add the following: "Under direction to inspect the sanitary condition of places where foods are prepared for sale or sold, and to examine food products, or to inspect meats and meat products and the sanitary condition of establishments where such products are handled."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order for an explanation.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, before offering this amendment I discussed same with the chairman and members of the committee explaining the reason why it was necessary. This reclassification bill applies only to the employees in the District of Columbia, and as far as the veterinarians in the Bureau of Animal Industry are concerned, I am advised they are satisfied, but some of the lay inspectors are fearful their rights may be prejudiced because of the various lines of activity connected with their positions. In the District of Columbia there are no slaughtering houses and the work is confined to observation over canning, packing, rendering, storing, and cooking meats. In the larger cities these lay inspectors are engaged in inspecting stock on the hoof, as well as biological products used for the treatment of animals in tuberculosis and hog-cholera serum plants. Furthermore, they assist in determining what food products are properly prepared and labeled, but the great majority are engaged in packing-house inspection. Consequently the chairman realizes this amendment will clarify the situation and take care of all these good fellows. I sincerely trust the amendment will carry.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I have examined this amendment, the gentleman from Illinois was good enough to show it to me, and I can see no objection to it. I think if there were such employees in the District of Columbia, and there may be such, I do not know where they are properly allocable as he seeks to grade them.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

POLICE AND CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION SERVICE.

The police service shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to perform, supervise, or inspect work involved in the preservation of law and order and the protection of life and property, special police or detective work of a confidential nature, work in executing the orders of Federal courts, or in preserving game for the public use.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $1,560 and $1,620.

Grade 2 shall include all classes of positions in this service the duties of which are, during a definite watch under immediate supervision as a police private or detective, to perform work as directed in the preservation of law and order, the protection of life and property, and the prevention of crime and disorder; under direction to have immediate charge of a squad of patrolmen working in park areas, reservations, squares, and adjoining streets.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $2,280 and $2,400.

In addition the following extra allowances shall be paid: Police lieutenants or detective sergeants assigned as assistant inspectors in the detective bureau shall receive an extra compensation of $360 in addition to the above rates for lieutenant.

Grade 5 shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are, under general direction as police captain, to act as commanding officer for a police company, or to have immediate charge of the police work in the District of Columbia in connection with women and children, or to assist in the general supervision of detective and identification work; or to have direct supervision over a group of officers engaged in carrying out the orders and assisting in the police and other work of a Federal court.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $2,580 and $2,760.

In addition the following extra allowances shall be paid: Police captains assigned as inspectors in the detective bureau shall receive an extra compensation of $360.

Grade 6 shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are, under general supervision, as police inspectors to inspect police property, buildings, and personnel, or as chief deputy United States marshal to assist in the administration of the office of the United States marshal.

Grade 7 shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to assist in the general administration of the Metropolitan police department or in the administration of the migratory bird treaty act and the Lacey Act.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $3,600 and $3,900.

Grade 8 shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to exercise administrative direction over the Metropolitan police department; to have responsible charge of the office of the United States marshal; to assist in the general administration of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department or the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice; or to enforce the provisions of the migratory bird treaty act and the Lacey Act.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $4,500, $4,800, and $5,100.

Grade 9 shall include all classes of positions the duties of which are to have responsible charge of the Secret Service Division, the Bureau of Investigation, or the Division of Post Office Inspectors.

The annual rates of compensation for classes of positions in this grade shall be $5,400, $5,700, and $6,000, unless a higher rate is specifically authorized by law.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend salary schedules of police and criminal investigation service as follows:

Page 29, line 17, strike out "$1,560" and "$1,620" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,460" and "$1,520."

On page 30, lines 2 and 3, strike out "$1,680," "$1,740," "$1,800," "$1,860," "$1,920" and insert "$1,560," "$1,620," "$1,680," "$1,740," "$1,800."

On page 31, lines 2 and 3, strike out "$1,920," "$2,040," and "$2,160" and insert "$1,860," "$1,920," and "$1,980."

On page 31, line 18, strike out "$2,280" and "$2,400" and insert "$2,120" and "$2,240."

On page 32, line 9, strike out "$2,580" and "$2,760" and insert "$2,520" and "$2,580."

On page 32, line 19, strike out "$3,000" and "$3,240" and insert "$2,760" and "$3,000"; and on line 21 strike out "$3,480" and insert "$3,240."

On page 33, line 2, strike out "$3,600" and "$3,900" and insert "$3,300" and "$3,600."

On page 33, line 19, strike out "$5,400," "$5,700," and "$6,000" and insert "$5,100," "$5,400," and "$5,700."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to argue the amendment that I have offered except simply to state that it is one agreed upon by the committee and in line with the similar amendments we have heretofore considered and adopted to-day. The adoption of this amendment will work a considerable economy and at the same time will afford a fair rate of compensation to the employees affected by it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice that the amendment has reduced generally the salaries of all those in the service, at least the higher salaries, except of those officials found on page 33, lines 12 and 13.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will permit, that grade includes the superintendent of the Metropolitan police, who now receives $4,500 per annum, which is his salary as fixed by the provisions of the Mapes bill of December 5, 1919.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the salaries now being paid to the other officials who are included in grade 8? Even if the chief of the Metropolitan police is receiving the minimum salary of $4,500 a year, that would not prevent a promotion if it was desired to have him go to the highest grade.

Mr. BLACK. No; he would still be eligible for promotion, it is true, but it was not the intention of the committee in the revision of these salary increases to reduce the compensation of the superintendent of the Metropolitan police, and for that reason this one particular schedule was left as written in the bill. If we had lowered it from the present figures such would have amounted to a reduction, and the committee knows of no reason why that should be done.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, that would not reduce his salary, anyhow. If the maximum salary was $4,500, his salary would not be reduced at the rate of compensation. This will increase his salary.

Mr. BLACK. No. Under the terms of the bill an employee who receives $4,500 now will, of course, go into the $4,500 grade.

Mr. MANN. He is eligible for promotion the same as other employees in the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman information as to the salaries being paid to the other designated officials, for instance, those in the office of the United States marshal, and in general administration of the Secret Service division in the Treasury Department, or the Bureau of Investigation in the Department of Justice?

Mr. BLACK. My recollection is that the Chief of the Bureau of Investigation in the Treasury Department receives $4,500 per annum and his assistant chief receives $3,500. Of course, I can not carry all these salaries in my mind, but my recollection also is that the Chief of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice gets $4,000 per annum.

Mr. CLOUSE. If the gentleman will permit, under section 10 the bill provides that the Civil Service Commission may at any time promote a person to a vacant position in a higher grade and at a higher rate of compensation, any provision of the law to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there any provision in the bill that will prevent the officers to which you have just now referred from being promoted to the highest grade?

Mr. BLACK. The Civil Service Commission, I will say to the gentleman, does not promote anybody.

Mr. CLOUSE. What does this section 10 mean, then?

Mr. BLACK. The promotions are made by the heads of the departments upon efficiency ratings which are prescribed by the Civil Service Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five minutes because I wish to direct an inquiry to him on a different subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas may be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLOUSE. The gentleman says the Civil Service Commission has no authority to promote. I am frank to say I am earnestly endeavoring to understand this bill——

Mr. BLACK. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. CLOUSE. If section 10 means anything other than that the Civil Service Commission may promote, I would like the gentleman to explain.

Mr. BLACK. Section 10 reads:

That, subject to such rules and regulations as the Civil Service Commission may from time to time prescribe, an employee may be transferred from a position in one grade to a vacant position within the same grade.

But that transfer is to be carried out, I will say to my friend from Tennessee, by the head of the department. In order, however, to have uniformity in all matters of transfer your committee thought it best to have the Civil Service Commission promulgate some uniform rules and regulations as to transfer and all the heads of the departments must obey these rules. That will enable transfers to be effected in proper cases and will at the same time, we hope, prevent any abuses of the privilege.

Mr. CLOUSE. It is true it provides for the transfer and it likewise provides for the promotion to a position in a higher grade.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman does not contend that the Civil Service Commission will promote anybody?

Mr. CLOUSE. They prescribe a rule and the head of a department may immediately promote to a higher grade.

Mr. BLACK. The head of a department has the right under this bill to promote under efficiency rating not more than once a year, and then only within the salary ranges of the grades. The House has also, since the bill was taken up for consideration, adopted an amendment which I offered further safeguarding the Government against abuses of the promotion privilege by providing that none of these increases in salaries shall become effective until Congress itself shall appropriate the money to pay the increase.

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes; but we provide in this bill, if the gentleman remembers, that this shall be a sufficient authorization for the appropriation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is only an exception, where the Bureau of the Budget recommends a salary outside of the classification entirely, for a specific individual.

Mr. BLACK. It is true that the bill furnishes sufficient authority for Congress to appropriate money, but a promotion does not become effective until Congress takes affirmative action and ratifies it by appropriating the money.

Mr. CLOUSE. Does not that apply also to a particular class? I call your attention to section 7. Does it not embrace every class contained in the entire bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said that where the bill speaks of this provision being sufficient authority to make the appropriation, that language is used in connection with where the Director of the Budget may make a special recommendation. But, of course, the act of Congress is authority for Congress to make the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the amendment. I notice in three places in this service under consideration that the committee refers to two acts of Congress not in the customary phraseology of legislation but in the popular phraseology, as the "migratory bird treaty act" and the "Lacey Act." It is not customary in referring to acts of Congress to refer to them by their popularly known names. I think it is open to some criticism. I think it would be better to refer to them by giving the dates of the acts, so that it would be more definite.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Everybody knows what is meant, and no department head and no official of the Government or comptroller can close his eyes to what statute is meant when the usual and common term by which it is frequently referred to in Government publications is employed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take issue with the gentleman as to there being any such popularly accepted meaning of the act of 1900 as "the Lacey Act." It is true that Representative Lacey was the sponsor for it in the House, but it has not received that accepted definition.

Mr. MANN. I would not think that that would be a very good reference.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask the authority on phraseology, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], whether it is customary to refer to acts in this form?

Mr. MANN. I am not an authority.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it would be preferable in the case of these acts to refer to them by their dates.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I have no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, after the pending amendment is disposed of, I will offer a series of amendments to clarify the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on behalf of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas on behalf of the committee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Amend fire service salary schedule:

On page 34, line 11, strike out "$1,680," "$1,740," "$1,860," and "$1,920" and insert "$1,560," "$1,620," "$1,680," and "$1,800."

On page 34, line 17, strike out "$1,980," "$2,040" and insert "$1,800" and "$1,920."

Page 34, line 23, strike out "$2,100" and "$2,160" and insert "$2,040" and "$2,100."

Page 35, line 11, strike out "$2,280" and "$2,400" and insert "$2,160" and "$2,280."

Page 35, line 23, strike out "$2,580" and "$2,760" and insert "$2,520" and "$2,700." And on line 25 of the same page strike out "$2,760" and "$2,940" and insert "$2,700" and "$2,880."

Page 36, line 10, strike out "$3,180" and "$3,420" and insert "$3,000" and "$3,240."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] inform the committee as to how the amended salaries conform to the salaries now paid to the members of the fire department?

Mr. BLACK. The pay of privates in the police department and in the fire department is the same. There are three grades—$1,460, $1,560, and $1,660, and they also receive the $240 bonus which is now paid.

In order to conform to the general revision of the bill as nearly as we have been able to figure it out we have reduced the salary schedule for police privates to where it will be $1,560, $1,620, $1,680, $1,740, and $1,800, and we make the same schedule as to firemen.

Mr. STAFFORD. At present the entrance salary for firemen and policemen is what?

Mr. BLACK. It is $1,460 plus the bonus, making $1,700.

Mr. STAFFORD. And you now propose to have the entrance salary what?

Mr. BLACK. One thousand five hundred and sixty dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. Raising the entrance salary $100 for both firemen and policemen?

Mr. BLACK. Yes, over that of the Mapes law of December, 1919, but reducing the salary schedule from what it now is including the bonus. In other words, the committee seeks to accomplish by these amendments the same ratable reductions as to firemen and policemen schedules of the bill as we have accomplished as to other parts of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of the section that we have just been considering, commencing with line 21 on page 8, and insert the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: On page 8, beginning with line 21, strike out all of the remainder of section 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had not completed the reading of the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent to interrupt the reading of the amendment for a moment. I do this at the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] who offers the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes pending the reporting of the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The amendment offered is the schedule of compensation contained in the Wood bill (H. R. 2921), by which it is proposed to replace the compensation schedules which have just been read and adopted by the committee. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] agrees that, inasmuch as these schedules are very long and are already in print and available to the Members of the House, further reading of the amendment be dispensed with. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Reserving the right to object, has the amendment ever been read?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it never has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it has not been read.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It has been printed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, I do not think we ought to agree to an amendment in the House without reading it.

Mr. BLACK. We are not going to agree to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Or even to consider an amendment without reading it. I think the amendment should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas objects. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish, first, to congratulate the reading clerk on his ability to read, and, second, I wish to say that for the purpose of expediting time I consented that the amendment I proposed should not be read in full, but I do ask each Member before we come to the final vote to read the amendment which I have just proposed. It will be enlightening at any rate, and it will show the two different schemes proposed for reclassification. The thing I wish to call attention to is this: Instead of making a classification with a range of salary with the right of promotion from one range to another, as under the pending bill, in the amendment I have offered there is a definition of work performed and the range of salary following that work performed; that is to say, every salary must be predicated on the actual work performed by a given clerk, and it applies to all different departments alike.

I think it is an improvement for the reason I have suggested, and I wish to reiterate that under the proposal in the pending measure, if it is adopted and becomes a law, there is absolutely no check except the conscience of the man who makes the promotion with reference to raising the salary from the minimum to the maximum. If this Congress is to proceed in the future as it has in the past, with a constant tendency toward the higher salary, the so-called Lehlbach bill will increase the salary roll of this country more than $19,000,000 in my opinion.

This is the most important piece of legislation that this session of Congress will have to do with so far as dollars and cents are concerned. It is not a mere passing of a bill for temporary relief of clerks of this country. It is the placing on the statute book of a permanent salary list that will stand as long as time, or until some other war, which God forbid ever takes place, when there will be a clamor again to increase these permanent salaries. So I say it behooves every man before he casts his vote on this bill—and I am going to see that he has an opportunity before he votes—to determine well his action and to decide whether he wants to commit himself and his country to the possibilities of extravagant expenditure that are confined within the limits of this measure.

I stated the other day, and I wish now to state, that this is the worst time in the world to attempt to make permanent salaries. It has been admitted here in the argument this afternoon that these salary lists were made up at a time when the cost of living was at its peak. It is contended now that it has not been very materially reduced. Some say it has by 50 per cent, and some contend that it has only been reduced by 33⅓ per cent. If that is so, it is proof conclusive, or should be, to the minds of fair-minded men that this is no time to fix a permanent salary which is to apply in normal times.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I have great respect for the gentleman's knowledge along these lines. In his judgment if this bill be passed as read and amended how much will the total increase be?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the bill is passed with the amendments adopted it will increase the salaries in the country to the amount of the present bonus.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And then some.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And then some; but I would not undertake to say how much. That is the lowest of the possibilities.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How much increase, if any, will there be if the gentleman's amendment be adopted?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If my amendment be adopted, according to calculations, it would increase the present cost of the Government, including the bonus, 1 per cent. I have not offered this thing with the hope of having it adopted, because if I thought it would be adopted I would say to you with the same frankness what I am now saying in respect to the Lehlbach bill, that I think it is an inopportune time to fix permanent salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is fixing on the taxpayers of this country a salary list that we would not have thought of prior to our going into the war. We are all hoping, we are all trying to devise ways and means, to get back to that normalcy where we were before the war commenced. There is no reason why, if we are normal and the world is normal, the cost of living should be any higher to-day than it was when we entered the war. I think all will admit that. If we do get back to that normal condition we would then have an abnormal salary list if this bill passes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If the committee were to adopt the gentleman's amendment, then would it not increase salaries on a permanent basis?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is true, but that is an absolute impossibility. My purpose in introducing it was to show the advantages so far as the schemes are concerned. If that improbability should happen to my amendment, then the Congress of the United States with each annual appropriation bill could lower the salaries of every clerk by just simply dropping from a higher to a lower grade. That can not be done under the present scheme unless each one of these classifications be revised and the salary range changed. Under the bill that I propose here there would be 18 grades, with a salary for each grade. It might fit the occasion this year. I think it would fit the occasion this year, because it would amount to the statutory salary, together with the bonus. That would cover this continuing high cost of living. Suppose next year that the cost of living has been reduced 25 per cent. Then in the appropriation bill you could drop back the salaries one grade and it would cover that 25 per cent, and then if the next year after that it should be reduced 25 per cent, you could drop back the list one grade more, and you would cover that; but that is a physically impossible thing to do under the Lehlbach bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I understand the gentleman's position is that his amendment would prove the converse of the Lehlbach bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; for this reason: The minimum fixed in the Lehlbach bill includes, except in the entrance positions, the bonus added as a permanent part of the salary. All admit that, and it will remain that way until there is some affirmative action of Congress to reduce it. It would take independent legislation to do that. If my scheme were adopted they would pay the maximum salary to-day of the grade, because the Congress would feel in its conscience that it is necessary to do that in order to meet this high cost of living, but next year the cost of living being reduced, they would reduce the grade into the next lower grade, but you will have no such flexibility or possibility in the Lehlbach bill.

Mr. TILSON. Would not that take congressional action?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Certainly not; under the Holman rule it could be done.

Mr. TILSON. But it would take congressional action.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Of course it would, but with each recurring Congress the Appropriations Committee could do that thing on the investigation then made.

Now, there will be no investigation, because you have permanently fixed a minimum salary that covers and includes the bonus, and you have got a maximum salary that is way beyond the bonus, which will be a fixed salary one of these days.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman mind telling the committee whether he intends to ask for a reading of the engrossed copy of the bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes, sir, I do; for I want every man here to read this thing if he will. That is the only way that he can have any chance to do it. This being the most important bill, so far as it can be measured in dollars and cents is concerned that we will deal with, it behooves every man here to vote intelligently upon this proposition and see whether or not in his own mind he is not convinced that this is not the time to fix permanent salaries such as are provided for in the pending measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I can state that I merely wish to reply for five minutes and then move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman intend to rise before the vote upon the amendment or afterwards?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 8928, the reclassification bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Let us pray. MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2108. An act prohibiting the interment of the body of any person in the cemetery known as the Cemetery of White's Tabernacle, No. 39, of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia;

H. R. 8744. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn., and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9237. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

MEMORIAL HIGHWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I present a communication in the nature of a petition with an attached resolution adopted by the American Scenic and Historic Preservation Society, relative to the creation of a memorial highway commission to locate certain historic points in France and Belgium, the idea being to lay out a system of highways that will connect those places. I desire that the statement and resolution shall be printed in the RECORD, without reading, and referred to the appropriate committee, which I suppose will be the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the statement and resolution were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN SCENIC AND HISTORIC PRESERVATION SOCIETY.

(Minutes of Board of Trustees, Oct. 31, 1921.)

MEMORIAL HIGHWAY IN FRANCE AND BELGIUM.

The principal object of the creation of the proposed memorial highway commission is the establishment of a memorial highway to facilitate access to the fields of operation of the World War in France and Belgium, and to secure the erection of suitable memorials along such highway indicating the history of their respective localities or neighborhoods and perpetuating the memory of the American troops which took part in the operations in the various sectors along the route.

For this purpose it is proposed that existing highways be linked together and improved, where necessary and possible, after the manner of the Lincoln Highway in the United States.

The Lincoln Highway consists of a chain of State, county, and municipal highways, starting from the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D. C., with a branch to the Arlington (Va.) National Cemetery, runs through Maryland into Pennsylvania, where it passes the Gettysburg Battle Field and National Cemetery, and thence runs westward to the Pacific Ocean. Along this route tablets have been erected commemorating historical events that have occurred all the way across the continent. The route is further indicated by red, white, and blue bands painted on the telegraph and telephone poles and guideposts. The roads are usually the ones most frequented in the regions through which they pass, and their development and improvement, under the stimulus of the historical and civic interest aroused, have greatly facilitated travel and benefited the communities through which they run.

The great number of Americans who now go to France and Belgium, some to revisit the scenes of their military service overseas, others to visit the places where relatives served, and still others to study the fields of operation in the World War from the historical standpoint, will increase rather than decrease as time goes on. Not only will the financial means for travel increase with the return of normal times, but in the order of nature future generations will multiply the number of descendants or relatives of the 2,000,000 Americans who went to France in 1917–18—descendants and relatives who will take pride in the achievements of their predecessors and wish to visit the scenes of their service. It is desirable that such travel be encouraged in order that the patriotic memories of the World War may be cherished, and also that the bonds of friendship between the United States and the allied nations may be strengthened by continued mutual intercourse. It is needless to say that Americans are welcome guests in France and Belgium, and that any measures which would promote their visiting would have cordial sympathy and encouragement.

The routes tentatively suggested for the memorial highway in France and Belgium are as follows:

1. Paris to Coblenz: This route starts from Paris near which, at Suresnes, is one of the six permanent American cemeteries in France. Thence it runs northeastward through Meaux to Chateau-Thierry, near which at Belleau is another of the permanent American cemeteries. Thence it runs along the Marne River to Epernay, where it turns northward to Rheims; thence goes eastward to Montfaucon. A short distance north of Montfaucon is the Meuse-Argonne permanent cemetery for Americans at Romagne. From Montfaucon the route runs northward to Stenay; thence in a generally northeastward direction along the route taken by the American Army of occupation through Montmedy, Longuyon, Longwy, Luxembourg, and Treves to the Coblenz bridgehead on the Rhine.

2. Verdun-St. Mihiel-Toul-Metz route: This route leaves the Paris-Coblenz route at Montfaucon and runs southeastward to Verdun, thence southward and southeastward through St. Mihiel to Toul. There it turns sharply to the northward and runs through Flirey, passes another of the permanent American cemeteries called the St. Mihiel Cemetery at Thiaucourt, continues northward to Mars-la-Tour, eastward to Metz, and northward through Thionville to Luxembourg, where it rejoins the Paris-Coblenz route.

3. Chateau-Thierry to Brussels: This route leaves the Paris-Coblenz route at Chateau-Thierry and runs in a generally northward and northwestward direction through Soissons, passing near the Oise-Aisne permanent cemetery for Americans, and thence paralleling the Hindenburg line to Peronne, passing near the Somme cemetery for Americans at Bony. From Peronne the route may run directly northward to Arras or make a detour westward to Amiens, thence northeastward to Arras. From the latter point the tentative route continues northward to Oostroosebeke in Belgium, where the Ninety-first American Division was located when the war ended, thence eastward to Brussels. This route would pass a proposed American cemetery in Belgium.

It will be observed that these suggested routes lead through or near the scenes of most of the major operations in which the American troops and the Allies took part, also near the seven principal permanent American cemeteries in France and Belgium. The routes above described are only tentative, but are suggested to show the possibilities of the plan. The permanent routes would be selected in cooperation with the French and Belgian authorities if the plan meets with their approval.

It is suggested that the memorial highway be indicated by suitable markers or by the national colors, somewhat after the manner of the Lincoln Highway in the United States.

Along this memorial highway it is proposed that simple historical tablets be erected giving designations of the American divisions engaged at or near the points passed by the highway, the names of the commanders, and the dates of the engagements, with other appropriate data showing the relation of their movements to those of allied divisions. It is hoped that the French and Belgians will cooperate in erecting similar tablets, so that the series will tell the chief historical events of the entire route. It is not proposed to erect elaborate monuments along the memorial highway, but it is suggested that the tablets might be elevated on battle mounds, on or near which there might be small parks of military trophies, heaps of war relics, specimens of barbed-wire entanglements, "tanks," and other devices illustrative of the military operations in the neighborhood.

It is recommended that at Coblenz there be erected two bronze tablets, one containing the roster of troops of the American Army of occupation and the other the roster of the present American forces in Germany, after the style of the bronze tablets to commemorate the campaign of Santiago de Cuba and of the China Relief Expedition.

It is suggested that the American memorial commission, to be appointed by the President of the United States, include the Hon. Myron T. Herrick, ambassador to France; the Hon. Brand Whitlock, ambassador to Belgium; Maj. Gen. Henry T. Allen, commanding the first American Army of occupation; President Lowell, of Harvard University, representing the New England States; President Butler, of Columbia University, representing New York; and other distinguished Americans of similar character.

It is proposed that the Quartermaster General of the Army have charge of the wording, making, and care of the memorial tablets, in order to insure their historical accuracy, and that their design be approved by the National Fine Arts Commission at Washington.

It is also recommended that the National Fine Arts Commission act in an advisory capacity with the Quartermaster General of the Army in the laying out and care of the American cemeteries in France and Belgium.

After a brief discussion of the subject the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved by the Board of Trustees of the American Scenic and Historic Preservation Society, That the President of the United States be very respectfully requested to take such measures as to him may seem advisable for the appointment of a memorial highway commission to be composed of 11 or more American citizens distinguished in civil or public life, to cooperate with the appropriate authorities in France and Belgium in laying out a memorial highway through the zone of the World War in France and Belgium, and erecting thereon suitable memorials of the sacrifices and triumphs of the Allies in that struggle.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the Wooster Boalt Post, No. 34, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, of Norwalk, Ohio, favoring the enactment of legislation increasing pensions for Civil War veterans and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PHIPPS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Denver, Edgewater, Boulder, Berthoud, Canon City, Paonia, Colorado Springs, and Eads, all in the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1948, providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7589) for the relief of Maj. Ellis B. Miller, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 360) thereon.

Mr. KEYES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1690) to correct the military record of John Sullivan, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 361) thereon.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 37) granting pensions to certain members of the former Life-Saving Service (Rept. No. 362); and

A bill (S. 2199) to provide for the marking of anchorage grounds in waters of the United States (Rept. No. 363).

REFUND TO EX-CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. STERLING. From the Committee on Civil Service I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2802) to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. KING. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will withhold his objection. The bill, I will state to the Senator from Utah, is simply for the purpose of expediting the payment of refunds to civil-service employees who are separated from the service before the time for retirement under the civil service retirement law. That is the sole purpose of the bill. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not hear the first part of his statement.

Mr. STERLING. The sole purpose of the bill is to expedite the payment of refunds to civil-service employees who have become separated from the service. There are over 70,000, I think about 77,000, of these refunds, and there are about 22,000 yet remaining to be adjusted. Under the law as it is, it is a slow and tedious process to have these adjustments and payments made. This is merely to cut out some of the red tape that is involved in the procedure with the consequent delay.

Mr. KING. Does it change the substantive law?

Mr. STERLING. It does not, I think, change the substantive law at all. It really is an interpretation of the substantive law so that it will be certain that the payments can be made by the Commissioner of Pensions without going through the Civil Service Commission, but on records required to be kept by the various departments and certified direct to the Commissioner of Pensions under whose authority the payments are finally made.

Mr. KING. I had in mind, when objection was made, the fact that there has been, as the Senator knows, a very extended propaganda to immediately amend the law before its full operation and effect have been ascertained.

Mr. STERLING. There is no effort to amend the law along any of the lines that the Senator from Utah has in mind. I have talked with him in regard to some of the efforts to amend the law, and I am not in favor of them any more than he is, but the bill now pending does not undertake to do that. It is in the interest both of accuracy and expedition in the making of these payments.

Mr. KING. I shall withdraw the objection, but I suggest to the Senator that he permit us to get through with the morning business, and then I shall join with him in asking for its consideration. I am not objecting; but suggest that we first get throught with the routine morning business.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will allow me——

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I might make a statement which would satisfy my vigilant friend from Utah. I went over this matter personally with the chairman of our committee yesterday morning; I went into it thoroughly; and I assure my friend, the Senator from Utah, that the bill is absolutely unobjectionable and simply puts the work on a business basis.

Mr. KING. Having so much confidence in the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Georgia, I withdraw the objection; but I do suggest that they permit us to get through with the routine morning business and then recur to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Utah objects to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. KING. No. I do not; but I ask the Senator to let us get through with the routine morning business.

Mr. STERLING. It will take no longer to dispose of it now, I will say to the Senator from Utah, than at any other time. Why may we not go ahead with it now? It will take but a moment.

Mr. KING. I never can resist the seductive appeals of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I have another bill, unanimous consent for the consideration of which I intended to ask, but I shall not do it if the Senator will consent to the consideration of this bill now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I take my seat.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the bill, and read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof three new paragraphs to read as follows:

"Each executive department, and each independent establishment of the Government not within the jurisdiction of any executive department, shall establish and maintain such record as will enable it to determine the amount deducted within each fiscal year from the basic salary, pay, or compensation of each employee within its jurisdiction to whom this act applies. When such employee is transferred from one office to another a certified abstract of his official record shall be transmitted to the office to which the transfer is made.

"When application is made to the Commissioner of Pensions for return of deductions and accrued interest, as provided in this section, such application shall be accompanied by a certificate from the proper officer showing the complete record of deductions, by fiscal years, and other data necessary to the proper adjustment of the claim.

"The Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall establish rules and regulations for crediting and reporting deductions and for computing interest hereunder."

SEC. 2. That section 13 of such act of May 22, 1920, is amended to read as follows——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think it is hardly necessary to read section 13. There are just two words inserted in section 13 as it now stands and those two words are "for annuity," to be inserted at the proper place. The matter of refunds having been covered by the other three paragraphs which the Secretary has read, there is no necessity to read the entire section 13, which is rather long. It is simply proposed to have those two words inserted in section 13 for the purpose of harmonizing that section with the other paragraphs of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, section 13 will not be read.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior be printed in the RECORD without reading in connection with this bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 2, 1921.

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Chairman Committee on Civil Service,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I submit herewith a proposed amendment of the civil service retirement law of May 22, 1920 (41 Stat., 614), which is strongly urged by the Commissioner of Pensions to expedite the adjudication of applications for refund under that law.

On account of the many separations from the service, due to reduction of force, there have been filed over 72,000 applications for refund, and there are more than 22,000 of these still undisposed of. Under a ruling by the Comptroller of the Treasury (27 Comp. Dec., 686) the Commissioner of Pensions can not require the heads of departments to report the actual amount of the deductions taken from the salary of employees, and he is required to calculate the amount from the period of service and rate of pay reported to him.

This procedure is not in the interest either of accuracy or expedition. Of course it is the actual amount and not the theoretical amount which should be returned, and it has been found that the legal amount has not in all cases been deducted. Due to the fact that the present appropriation is not sufficient to enable the Bureau of Pensions to keep the work current under existing practice, much criticism has been made by former employees who feel that their applications should be acted upon more expeditiously. The proposed change in the law will authorize a procedure which will facilitate the settlement of such cases.

Therefore I recommend favorable and early action on the proposed amendment.

Respectfully,

E. C. FINNEY, Acting Secretary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment Senate concurrent resolution No. 16.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. It fixes the time for the holiday recess. Members on both sides of the aisle have asked that it be acted on at an early day so that they might make their arrangements for the holidays. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The reading clerk read Senate concurrent resolution 16, submitted by Mr. CURTIS on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the two Houses complete the business of the calendar day of Thursday, December 22, 1921, they shall stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian Tuesday, January 3, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERK, COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, during the last session of Congress the Senate authorized the Committee on the District of Columbia to appoint a clerk for the last session at a salary of $1,600 a year. The chairman of that committee, the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], introduced a resolution authorizing the continuation of the employment of that clerk during the remainder of this Congress.

I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably the resolution, which I do, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It provides for the continuation of the employment of this clerk for the remainder of the present Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 182) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 68, agreed to May 31, 1921, authorizing the Committee on the District of Columbia to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $1,600 per annum, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, be, and it hereby is, renewed to continue in full force and effect from December 1, 1921, until the end of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not like to object to a matter of this kind; but resolutions of this character heretofore have confined the employment of such clerks to the session, and I think the same rule ought to be followed with reference to all of these temporary clerks, for that is what they are contemplated to be. I will ask the chairman of the District Committee if he would not be willing to have the employment of this clerk limited to the session?

Mr. BALL. I am perfectly willing to make it for the session, but I was informed by the financial clerk that the usual custom was to draw such resolutions for the Congress. My request was that it be made for this session, and he drew it for the duration of this Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know why he should do that.

Mr. BALL. I have no objection to making it for the session.

Mr. CALDER. I suggest that the resolution be amended so as to provide that the employment of the clerk be authorized for the present session of Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall have no objection to it in that form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 7, before the word "sixty-seventh," it is proposed to insert "second session," so that if amended it will read:

Until the end of the second session, Sixty-seventh Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 2865) for the relief of Barbara Johnson, widow of Thomas C. Johnson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KELLOGG:

A bill (S. 2867) granting a pension to W. H. H. Johnston; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2868) for the relief of F. A. Maron; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2869) providing for the remodeling and repairing of the post-office building at St. Paul, Minn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 2870) to authorize the Supreme Court to prescribe forms and rules, and generally to regulate pleadings, procedure, and practice on the common-law side of the Federal courts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 2872) to amend section 800 of the revenue act of 1921; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This bill proposes to extend to posts of the Veterans of Foreign Wars the tax-exemption provisions of the revenue act of 1921 to admissions, all proceeds of which inure to said post. It seeks to extend to the posts of the Veterans of Foreign Wars the same exemption now extended very properly to posts of the American Legion.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2873) for the regulation of commission men in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2874) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920; to the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, for some time complaint has been made, at least by one Senator, about promotions in the Army and the Navy. Notwithstanding the constant diminution in the numbers of the personnel both in the Army and in the Navy, we have been promoting officers by the score, indeed, by the hundred. When complaint has been made, the response has been that the law calls for these promotions. We shall soon have most of our officers in the advanced list—brigadier generals, major generals, and so forth.

I introduce a joint resolution to prevent further promotions in the Army, and one to prevent further promotions in the Navy and the Marine Corps until further ordered by Congress. I ask that the first joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the second to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

By Mr. KING:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 143) discontinuing promotions in the United States Army unless authorized by Congress; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 144) discontinuing promotions in the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States unless authorized by Congress; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMERICAN MEMORIAL HIGHWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. WILLIS. I introduce the bill which I send to the desk and which is designed to carry into effect the purposes of the petition which I presented a few moments ago. I ask that the bill may be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (S. 2864) for the creation of an American memorial highway commission for France and Belgium to designate the roads over which Americans marched to victory and to secure the erection of historical rosters of American divisions engaged and other appropriate memorials thereon was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAY OF THE ARMY, NAVY, AND KINDRED SERVICES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask the Secretary to read. It is exceedingly brief, and after it shall have been read, I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 142) to extend the time within which the Special Committee on the Readjustment of the Pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service may make its report to Congress was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the special committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, appointed in accordance with the last proviso of section 13 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved May 18, 1920, be, and it is hereby, authorized to make the report required in said section not later than the first Monday in March, 1922, notwithstanding that the said act requires the report to be made on or before the first Monday in January, 1922.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The joint resolution merely provides a method of securing an extension of the time during which the special committee may make its report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator from New York think that the committee will be able to submit its report within the time specified in the joint resolution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think so. I may say that our hearings are finished, but between now and Christmas it would be quite impossible for us to make a definite and comprehensive report.

Mr. KING. Is the committee considering the question of promotions and providing for arresting promotions in the Army and Navy?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee has no jurisdiction over promotions. It only has jurisdiction, according to the act of Congress, in a legislative sense, of course, over pay schedules and allowances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA.

Mr. FRANCE. I introduce a joint resolution which I send to the desk, and which I prefer to have referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as it deals with rather complex questions relating particularly to the condition of agriculture in which the West is vitally interested.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) to authorize the President of the United States to send a commission to Russia and to invite a Russian commission to the United States, to hold informal conversations with the de facto government of Russia for the purpose of arriving at a basis of understanding between the United States and Russia, to discuss and to negotiate all problems and differences which must be adjusted, looking to the formal recognition by the United States of the de facto government of Russia and to the restoration of friendly international and commercial relationships between the United States and Russia, was read twice by its title.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it would seem from the scope of the joint resolution which has just been read that it is properly referable to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The chairman of that committee is absent; in fact, I see no member of the committee present except the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], so I shall have to object to the resolution being referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. If the matter is to be one of contest, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana moves that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, would it be proper to ask that the joint resolution be again read by title in order that Senators may understand its scope and substance? I do not think all Senators heard it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution by title.

The joint resolution was again read by title.

Mr. NEW. I think it is perfectly manifest to all that the joint resolution should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Do I understand that the Senator from Nevada has moved such a reference?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has.

Mr. NEW. Very well.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in explanation of my request to have the joint resolution referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry rather than to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

While I was a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, particularly during the latter months of my membership on that committee, the committee was engaged in the effort to ascertain some means of relief to the farmers of the West and the cotton planters of the South. The committee made extensive investigations into the whole problem of what might be done to relieve the critical situation which exists in the South and in the West, a situation not only affecting the farmers and the cotton planters in those particular districts but affecting the bankers, who, as I said on yesterday, are compelled to carry notes secured by the crops which the farmers are unable to move, and also affecting the great industrial centers of the East, where there is a widespread depression because of the paralysis of the purchasing power of the farmers in the West and the cotton planters in the South.

This whole economic question has been very carefully investigated by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and in connection with the investigation the matter of foreign markets was very carefully considered and the possibility of reestablishing our export trade, because the investigations had not proceeded far before it became apparent to many members of the committee that the chief difficulty which stood in the way of a revival of agriculture in this country was the demoralization of our foreign trade. So the joint resolution I have introduced deals with a great economic question and one which is interwoven with the whole fabric of our industrial, commercial, and agricultural life, and I suggested reference to the Committee on Agriculture because I knew that committee had been making an exhaustive study of this whole question.

Then I may be very frank and add that a joint resolution along somewhat similar lines which I introduced many, many months ago and which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, a joint resolution upon which hearings were had both in open and in executive session, has not as yet received attention or at least a report at the hands of the Foreign Relations Committee. That joint resolution was introduced on the 27th of February, 1920.

I do not feel that the matter of reference is important. I think that ultimately the resolution would go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I thought that it would be most helpful——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not realize from the reading of the joint resolution the subject matter is such that it ought to be considered first by the Committee on Foreign Relations? I think clearly that is so.

Mr. FRANCE. I was about to add that I believe ultimately the joint resolution would go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I thought that the preliminary study of the question should be made by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I will say in answer to the question of the Senator from Kansas that the title of the joint resolution would indicate that it should undoubtedly go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. However, I will say that the body of the resolution, the subject matter——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I observe that in the body of the first paragraph of the resolution is contained this language, referring to the commission which the Senator's joint resolution seeks to create—> all of whom shall constitute a commission to visit Russia for the purpose of investigating and making report upon the problem of the restoration of normal and peaceful relationships between the United States and Russia.

And in the third paragraph of the resolution I find this language:

> For the purpose of establishing a basis of mutual understanding and cooperation between the two countries, for the purpose of settlement of all differences which may exist between them, and the adjustment of all claims which either of these Governments or its citizens may assert or have against the other, and for the bringing about of conditions which will make possible the resumption of cordial international and commercial relationships between the two countries.

And in another paragraph further along this language is contained:

> And refunding by the present de facto government of Russia of Russia's proper share of the debts and obligations of Russia outstanding, particularly the obligations of the old Imperial Government and concerning the proper proportion of such old imperial debts outstanding which should be borne by the present government of Russia and the proportion to be borne by the countries constituting the territories disannexed from Russia by the powers in the peace settlement.

The important matters dealt with in the resolution, of course, involve questions of international relationship, which, under the rules of the Senate, are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is inconceivable to me that at this time, considering the circumstances as they exist affecting our international relationships, the Senate should be expected to impose upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry the obligation of determining these questions and making recommendations respecting them to the Senate, and, on the other hand, should deprive the committee vested under its rules with the jurisdiction of the right to pass upon them. So I think the Senator had best concede the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. FRANCE. In answer to the very pertinent observations of the Senator from Arkansas I will state that there is force in what he says; but the Senator failed to read the other portions of the joint resolution. It is true that this commission is to be authorized to discuss questions of international financial and political relationships, but the other portions of the joint resolution, which were not read by the Senator, refer more particularly to the economic questions; and the Senator would find, if he read the whole resolution, that in the preamble——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator understand that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate takes jurisdiction of economic questions relating to foreign countries, or transactions between this country and foreign countries? The jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as I understand, does not extend to that, but all that is usually held to be within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRANCE. I have no contention with the Senator upon that point. The Senator and I are very much in agreement; but I do say that the purpose of this joint resolution in a general way is to give relief, not to Russia, but to our farmers in the West and to our cotton planters in the South, for the purpose of bringing about a general revival of industry in this country, which can not come about until that relief is had.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me, in that connection the Senator, however, proposes to accomplish that by effecting arrangements with foreign countries, particularly the country of Russia; and if the Senator's theory is correct that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry could acquire jurisdiction of this subject for that reason it might be held to deprive the Committee on Foreign Relations or other committees of the Senate of any jurisdiction whatever.

If the Senator will pardon a further statement, of course we understand that the real gist underlying the Senator's proposal to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry arises out of the fact that he does not think the Committee on Foreign Relations will act upon it promptly or favorably; but, to my mind, that is a very good reason why that committee, which is vested with jurisdiction of the subject under the rules of the Senate, should be required, or at least permitted, to consider the joint resolution. That committee is supposed to have knowledge of the affairs of this Government relating to foreign countries; and, as the Senator well knows, it is composed of Senators who are very eminent, very experienced, and very learned in matters affecting our foreign relations.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I have no contention with the Senator on any of the points which he has advanced. My thought was that as this is a measure particularly looking to the relief of the producers of crops in the West and in the South with a view to bringing about a general revival of trade, it might be very properly considered first by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and then perhaps considered later by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

However, I do not wish to consume the morning hour with a prolonged debate. I think really it is perhaps immaterial to which committee the joint resolution goes. I never have held to the doctrine of the infallibility of committees. I think committees are merely for the convenience of the Senate, and that any matter might very properly be referred to any committee which by any reasonable process of thought could be held to have any interest in the subject, on the theory that every measure must ultimately come before the Senate for action by the Senate, regardless of what committee reports it.

I have stated my position and my desire and have tried to indicate the reason why I suggested this reference. However, it is for the Senate to decide, and I am perfectly willing to yield my opinion to the opinion of the majority.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield the floor.

Mr. KING. I was called from the Chamber, and the Senator may have answered the thought that occurs to me now. It seems to me that this joint resolution in its present form commits us to a recognition of the government of Russia as a de facto government and does not wait until that fact shall be determined by some executive or legislative branch of the Government, but assumes in advance to commit us to the proposition that there is a de facto government in Russia which we recognize. It seems to me that a matter involving that question should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that this joint resolution in no sense recognizes any government in Russia. Our statute very clearly defines what a de facto government is—such a government as we should consider a de facto government. I can not quote the exact language of the statute to the Senator, but no doubt he has it in his very capacious brain, which is a most learned one on all subjects. Our statute defines a de facto government as being any faction or body of men who may be temporarily in control of a country. That is the general definition—a definition of the most inclusive kind. Any body or faction of men who even for a few days may be in control of a situation in a country are a de facto government of that country for those few days, under the definition in our statute. I can give the Senator a more definite reference to the statute later, if desired.

Mr. KING. I am not controverting the existence of a de facto government in Russia. I make no point upon that; but this joint resolution seemed to contemplate first that there was a de facto government, and secondly that we recognize it.

Mr. FRANCE. No; it does not do so. It merely suggests that a commission be sent there to investigate the whole situation, and that one be invited here to hold conversations with our representatives here, looking to an examination of all of the questions which must, of course, be settled before there could be any recognition to carry on the negotiations, all of which must be gone through before the question of recognition could be considered. It merely provides for the appointment of a commission to Russia and for the inviting of a commission here for the purpose of looking into the whole question of the possibilities of commercial and international relationships and of the ultimate possibility of a recognition of the de facto government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES JUDGES.

Mr. PHIPPS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside of their districts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

TRANSCONTINENTAL FREIGHT BUREAU.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have a Senate resolution which I wish to submit and ask for its present consideration. I discussed the matter with the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and with other members of the committee, and they see no reason why it should not be acted on immediately.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be reported.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask to have the resolution read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the Secretary will read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 194), as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into and report to the Senate as speedily as practicable upon the following matters, to wit:

The organization, management, and control of the Transcontinental Freight Bureau, R. H. Countiss, agent, 608 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.; the purposes for which the bureau was organized; its duties and activities; the names of the carriers it represents and the influence it exercises in the publication of rates, rules, fares, and charges as between carriers; whether its operation in any manner stifles competition; and any other facts and circumstances which the said Interstate Commerce Commission may deem important and necessary to a full knowledge and understanding of the organization and activities of the said bureau.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Ordinarily a resolution of that character would be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but in view of the difficulty of having a full committee present, and in view of the suggestions which are contained in the resolution itself, I can see no good object which might be accomplished by referring the resolution to the committee. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection either to the present consideration of the resolution or to its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada move the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. PITTMAN. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ISSUANCE OF CHECKS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I move to take from the table Senate bill 1033, with the amendments of the House, in which I moved to concur the other day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia, which were, on page 1, line 10, to strike out "imprisoned" and insert "guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable by imprisonment"; on page 2, lines 5 and 6, strike out "upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order," and insert "the amount due thereon"; and on page 2, line 7, after "any," to insert "within five days after receiving notice in person, or writing, that such draft, or order, has not been paid."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when this matter was up for consideration a few days ago, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] voiced their opposition to certain provisions of the bill. I shared the views which were expressed by those Senators. I regret very much that this bill is not here ab initio; that is, that we may not offer such amendments as may be deemed necessary in order to make it an acceptable legislative enactment.

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Arkansas have with great clearness and force called attention to one or more provisions of the bill, and expressed the view that those provisions are not defensible. The point which was attacked most forcibly by the Senators referred to was that which aimed at relieving an act which was criminal from criminality, providing payment were made to the person alleged to have been injured within five days after presentation of the check or draft. In other words, the bill would make it a crime, and the act itself would be fraudulent, if a check or draft were drawn when there were no funds in the bank to meet it; and yet, even with the criminal intent, the act would be robbed of its criminality if payment were made within five days after advices were furnished to the drawer of the check or draft that the check was not honored.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much interested in the statement of the Senator. I have not had occasion to examine the bill, but is it true that it provides that the intent shall be held to be criminal without any actual intention to defraud on the part of the person who draws the check? In other words, if by mistake, which is likely to occur at any time, and without any criminal intent, a person draws a check for an amount exceeding the amount he has on deposit, is that conclusively criminal under this proposed statute?

Mr. ROBINSON. May I answer the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under those circumstances the drawer of the check would be prima facie presumed to be guilty, and the burden would rest upon him of proving his innocence. But that is not the worst feature of the bill. The worst feature of the bill is the provision that if a bank makes a mistake and refuses a check which it ought to pay, on the ground that there are not sufficient funds in the bank, as sometimes happens, the same presumption arises, even though the party may have in the bank the money with which to pay the debt, and the only way he can escape prosecution under the provisions of the bill is to pay the amount of the check to the holder thereof within five days.

With the purposes of this legislation I am in sympathy. I do not propose to be put in the attitude of favoring or supporting a dishonest transaction; on the other hand, I do not believe that the Senate understands the effect of this measure, and I am convinced that when it does understand it it will not pass the bill in its present form. Under the bill if one drew a check on a bank or other depository and the bank refused to pay it on the ground that there were no funds there, a presumption would arise, from the refusal of the bank to pay the check on that account, that the party was guilty of a fraudulent intent. Anyone reading the bill will see that that is the only construction which can be given to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The fact that a check is drawn when there is not sufficient money in the bank to pay it, while it would not be conclusive of intent to defraud, as a matter of law, it seems to me, would be evidence of fraud and very proper to introduce, and if unexplained would be sufficient to sustain a conviction. I would not want to vote for any statute that would give a conclusive nature to a presumption of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the enactment of a bill forbidding the drawing of a check upon a bank or other depository where the party has not funds with which to meet the same, and I have no objection to making the fact that the funds are not there prima facie evidence that he intended to draw a check when the funds did not exist; but I object to making the refusal of the bank or other depository prima facie evidence of a fraudulent intent upon the part of the drawer of the check when, as a matter of fact, the drawer may actually have the money in the bank or other depository with which to pay the check.

Mr. JONES of Washington. While, of course, this point is really not in controversy under the motion, I hardly think the construction the Senator puts upon this bill is correct. Let me read it:

> That any person within the District of Columbia who, with intent to defraud, shall make, draw, utter, or deliver any check, draft, or order for the payment of money upon any bank or other depository, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivering that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank—

And so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, there is no objection to that. I have said I did not object to that. But the Senator must be familiar with this bill. Here is the clause to which I called attention——

Mr. JONES of Washington. This will have to be construed in connection with the other point the Senator makes.

Mr. ROBINSON. This clause is entirely independent, and I leave it to Senators. Listen to this:

> As against the maker or drawer thereof the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering by such maker or drawer of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee because of insufficient funds of the maker or drawer in its possession or control, shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository.

There is no room for construction; it is a plain statement of fact that if a bank refuses to pay a check on the ground that there are not sufficient funds with which to pay it, the drawer is prima facie presumed to be guilty of a fraud, even though, as a matter of fact, there may be funds in the bank to his credit with which to pay the check.

I have known of several instances where parties drew checks upon banks, and the banks refused to pay them for want of sufficient funds, but upon investigation of the matter it was found that the banks had made errors, and that there were funds out of which the checks could be paid. Under that state of facts the Congress would create by law a prima facie presumption of guilt, even though it would have appeared that the person drawing the check had the money in the bank with which to pay it, if his account had been correctly kept by the bank, and even though the refusal to pay it was a mistake by the bank. That is proposition No. 1, and if Senators read the language of the bill they can not get away from it. Let me read it again:

> As against the maker or drawer thereof the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering by such maker or drawer of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee because of insufficient funds.

No proof of intent is required under that; no proof of fraudulent purpose is required. The fraudulent purpose is presumed because of the making or drawing of the check payment of which is refused by the bank. Such a case as I have suggested would not happen often, but such instances have occurred, and may occur again. What is the occasion for raising a presumption of guilt when a person draws a check upon his account in the bank, when he has the right to draw it, and the bank has made a mistake in keeping his account? That is objection No. 1.

Objection No. 2 is equally important, if not more so. Under the second provision which I have said is objectionable, if one draws a check upon a bank with a fraudulent purpose or intent, and within five days after the crime has been committed makes good the amount, he can not be prosecuted, even though he has committed a crime.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to his colleague?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. It strikes me, from reading the bill, that the intent of the bill is this, that it makes no difference what the intent of the drawer of the check was, if he is able to pay he is innocent; and it makes no difference what his intent was, if he is unable to pay he is guilty.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is an epigrammatic statement of the effect of this bill. If he is innocent and is unable to pay, he is held guilty; if he is guilty of a crime and able to pay, he is held innocent. The time has not come when Congress ought to pass such laws as that. I know that some of the States have passed them. In one State I have in mind the provision with respect to this latter objection is—> Provided, If the drawer upon notice shall immediately make good the amount, he shall not be prosecuted.

There is no one here who doubts that the effect of this legislation would be to enforce the collection of a civil debt by a criminal prosecution. Why should Congress pass a measure under which in any case a man who is innocent shall be presumed to be guilty? Why should Congress in any case pass a measure under the terms of which one who is guilty shall be immune from prosecution?

Under the language of this bill, if you draw a check for $100,000 with a fraudulent intent to cheat the payee of the check, and become frightened and make good the amount within five days, no matter how criminal your intent or act may have been, you are held innocent under the provisions of this bill; and, as I have repeatedly stated, under the first provision to which I referred, if you draw a check honestly believing you have the funds in the bank with which to meet it, if you draw a check and in fact have the funds there, and the bank refuses payment on the check, whether its accounts are right or wrong, the presumption arises, when it refuses payment, that you are guilty of a crime, and the only way you can escape punishment is by making good the amount.

The time has not come when the Congress of the United States needs to lend itself to the collection of civil debts by the passage of criminal statutes. Let the man who has the intent and the purpose to defraud be held guilty under all circumstances and in all cases. Let the man who is actually innocent be protected from prosecution and conviction.

I have no interest or concern in the matter further than to see that Congress does what is right about it.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I can not see any well-founded objection to this bill. We have a similar law in many of the States of the Union. We have it in my State.

There is a good deal of ground for what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said about allowing days of grace in which to make up the funds to pay the debt, but that is intended as a matter of leniency and should not be used as an argument against the bill. I do not think there is very much in the Senator's first suggestion that banks would turn a check down when they might have money in the man's account, turning the check down through a mistake of the bank.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the Senator never known a bank to make a mistake in its accounting?

Mr. DIAL. Yes; often; but the bank would be liable in damages.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator think that would be adequate protection to the man who had been wrongfully indicted and prosecuted for drawing a check upon an account, where it was claimed there were not sufficient funds, when in fact he had sufficient funds to meet the check?

Mr. DIAL. That would be mighty poor consolation to that particular man.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is exactly what I thought about it, and Congress ought not to put itself in the attitude of making such a thing possible.

Mr. DIAL. Yes; I think it ought to. It would occur very seldom.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why should Congress authorize it to occur at all?

Mr. DIAL. Congress does not authorize it to occur, but it can not make human beings perfect, either bank officials or anybody else.

As a matter of law, as I understand it, there is no necessity for the bill. If a man draws a check on a bank where he has no money and gets the proceeds of that check, he has obtained money under false pretenses and can be prosecuted under the general law. But the bill is in the interest of the floating public and in the interest of helping people, instead of trying to hurt them. If a bank refuses to pay a check when a man has money in that bank, it would be liable to be mulcted in damages, and possibly very heavily mulcted. Therefore, that incident would occur possibly one time in a million, or much less frequently. Not only that, but any man dealing with the bank would be presumed to be on reasonably pleasant business terms with the officials of the bank, and they would know that the matter would soon be adjusted, if there was an oversight one way or the other.

I think if there is any place in the country that needs a law of this kind it is the District of Columbia. I have had a little experience myself. When I landed here they put me in the first room in the Senate Office Building, right by the front door, where every man who came to Washington, it seemed to me, called in to see me. I had not been there a week before a nicely dressed little fellow, looking like a dude, came in to congratulate me on being in the Senate. I felt pretty proud and thanked him. He said I was the very kind of man the country needed in the Senate. I appreciated his compliment. He told me who he was. He went on to say that he was over in Baltimore with his wife in the hospital, that he was assistant cashier of a bank in my State, and that he was a little bit short of change and had just dropped over to get me to help him out to the extent of $50 in cash. I am a good-natured kind of a fellow and will do about anything anybody asks me to, so everybody imposes on me, of course.

But that did not have exactly the right ring to me. The idea of an assistant cashier coming to me, a man he had never seen before, and wanting me to scotch him to the tune of $50 did not sound just right. I told him I had just landed in town and had not anchored in any bank yet, and had not brought along a great amount of surplus funds in my jeans, and that I was sorry that I could not accommodate him. I directed him over to the Congressman from his district, whom I knew to be pretty flush. [Laughter.] He said that he and that Congressman were not on good political terms. I thought there might be something in that. I scratched my head and looked at him again, and then I referred him to a man who is much more wealthy than I, and told him no doubt he would float him. He said he did not know about that and left.

About a week after that a Congressman came over and told me that I was young and green. I thanked him and told him I admitted that. He said he wanted to put me wise; said there was a young fellow going around all dressed up and that he had touched him for $50 and that another friend let him have $100, and then he had written down to South Carolina and found there was no such man in the State. He was an impostor.

I know of plenty of other instances. I was talking with a Congressman night before last who told me one of his experiences. These crooks are pretty wise. This Congressman is an exceedingly bright fellow and had had some experience and had been touched before. He said this man called to see him and told him who he was; that he was a great friend of his friends, and so on, and that they had always helped him politically. He said that he was at the hotel and the bill was more than he thought it would be. He said these hotels had a way of saying that a bill would be one thing, for instance, $5 a day for himself, but that he had brought his wife along and he thought it meant $5 a day for both, but when he got ready to go home they said it meant $5 each, $10 a day. Unfortunately he was short of funds.

The Congressman said he was a little shy, but he listened to him. The Congressman said if the fellow had told him he wanted $25 or $50 or an even amount, he would have shook his head and declined, but when the fellow told him he wanted $18.50 just to fix up that hotel bill, he said he thought the man was so accurate he must be honest just to ask for the odd dollars and cents; that he set him up. When he got back to the House he met a friend of his and this friend told him that he was delighted to meet his friend from South Carolina. He said, "What about it? What did he want?" His friend replied, "He said he was just a little shy of coin and he wanted a little help to pay his hotel bill," and he had also financed the fellow. That was another case of an impostor who got his money and had gone.

If there is any one place in the country where we need this kind of a law it is in the District of Columbia. I see no objection to the bill and think it ought to pass.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, about 23 years ago I had a similar experience to that of the Senator from South Carolina, the only difference being that instead of calling at my office they called at my house about midnight.

Mr. KING. I may say to the Senator that is outlawed. Twenty-three years is too long.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, it was paid long ago.

It is difficult for me to speak in proper language of the arguments that are used against this measure so I shall not refer to them. I do wish to call attention just to this fact, that in the State of Arkansas there is this language in the statute. After prohibiting the utterance of these checks it is provided:

Provided, however, That if any individual, corporation, or association of individuals, shall, when notified of such draft or check, immediately make a deposit to cover same, they shall not be subject to the provisions of this act.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I made reference to that statute myself. Does the Senator think that is a fair statute?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so. I think it is a fair statute.

Mr. ROBINSON. Suppose that the person had no evil intent and was unable to make reimbursement immediately; suppose that the bank had made a mistake in his account and should have paid the check, but refused to do so on the belief that there were not sufficient funds there, and he had been indicted and convicted, or an indictment was pending, and the party was called upon immediately to make good the amount, and he refused to do it. Does the Senator think that man ought to be prosecuted?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely read that proviso with reference to the particular suggestion which the Senator made. I am a little surprised at the first part of this Arkansas statute to find that it leaves out the words "with intent to defraud." I think it is rather hard in that respect.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the Arkansas statute is based upon intent to defraud.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not express that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes. I have the statute here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And I have it here, and it reads as follows:

It shall hereafter be unlawful for any individual, corporation, or association of individuals, resident or doing business in this State, to make or give any check or draft on any account in any bank or trust company or on any person, firm, or corporation on which the said individual, corporation, or association of individuals shall not have full authority to check or draw such draft or check, or having such authority to make any check or draft upon an account in any bank, savings bank, or trust company when there shall not be sufficient funds therein to cover the same, unless they shall have made prior arrangements—

And so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON. I stated I had no objection to a bill like that because that is based upon the question of whether the party has funds in the bank and not upon the refusal, right or wrong, of the bank to pay a check when drawn.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not going to argue that proposition with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, well, the Senator will argue it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not agree with the Senator's position at all. I do not believe that any court would agree with it, but that is only a matter of argument.

Mr. ROBINSON. With what feature does the Senator disagree?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am satisfied the knowledge that they have not funds in the bank is one of the main elements of this offense, and even though it might be held that the mere refusal of the bank to pay it was prima facie evidence, upon the mere presentation of the fact that the Senator suggests, that the bank had made a mistake or that there was money there, of course that would end it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes; but does the Senator think one who is actually innocent ought to be prosecuted and the burden of proof placed upon him to prove his innocence?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; and he will not be prosecuted under this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes; he will.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; he will not. I will take my chances under it. Every honest man will take his chances under it. There will be no trouble.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that is a fair statement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say frankly that I do not think the Senator's statement is fair. It is hardly worth while for us to argue it, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. The plain implication of the Senator's statement I do not think he means——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator said my statement was unfair.

Mr. ROBINSON. That those of us who are opposed to the bill are taking that position because we are afraid we will be prosecuted for drawing bad checks.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, certainly not. Of course the Senator knows I did not intend any reflection upon him or any other Senator on the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know what the Senator meant by his remarks.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think I have always tried to use language on the floor of the Senate in discussions not to reflect upon the opinion, the judgment, the honesty, or the sincerity of Members of the Senate. It was only the language which the Senator used that we were unfair in this matter that probably led me to say something he might construe differently.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have made no statement that anyone was unfair in this matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, the Senator used that very language, and the RECORD will show it.

Now, Mr. President, I have here the statute of Missouri with reference to this matter, which is almost word for word the language of the proposed bill. I wish to read the evidence part of it:

SEC. 2. Notice—Five days—How evidence: As against the maker or drawer thereof, the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee, shall be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depositary, provided such maker—

And so forth.

Then, I have here the statute from Utah, which provides:

The making, drawing, uttering, or delivering of such check, draft, or order, as aforesaid, shall be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud.

The pending bill is simply substantially in line with the legislation in 46 States of the Union. So much for the merits of the bill in general.

The Senate has passed the measure, the House has passed it with just a couple of changes, and apparently there is no objection to the making of those changes. They are the only matters that are involved in the situation, and that is all I care to say about it. I ask to have printed in the RECORD all of the statutes of Missouri, Utah, and Arkansas relating to this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

(Arkansas laws, 1913, No. 258, as amended 1917, No. 370.)

Be it enacted by the people of the State of Arkansas—

SECTION 1. It shall hereafter be unlawful for any individual, corporation, or association of individuals, resident or doing business in this State to make or give any check or draft on any account in any bank or trust company or on any person, firm, or corporation on which the said individual, corporation, or association of individuals shall not have full authority to check or draw such draft or check, or having such authority, to make any check or draft upon an account in any bank, savings bank, or trust company when there shall not be sufficient funds left therein to cover the same unless they shall have made prior arrangements with said bank, savings bank, or trust company for said check or overdraft: Provided, however, That if any individual, corporation, or association of individuals shall, when notified of such draft or check, immediately make a deposit to cover same, they shall not be subject to the provisions of this act: Provided further, That checks or drafts given where said individual, corporation, or association of individuals shall have had no checking account in said bank shall not come under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. Any individual, corporation, or association of individuals who shall give any check or draft, and later withdraw the account or deposit on which said draft or check was given and made, and not state to the said bank or trust company, person, firm, or corporation that checks are outstanding against said deposit or account, with the amount of said checks or drafts so outstanding, shall be considered as having violated the provisions of this act, but he may be excused or released in the manner provided in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. Any person or any officer or officers of the corporation or association or individuals who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than $25 nor more than $500: Provided, That if any check or draft mentioned in section 1 of this act shall exceed the sum of $100, then any person who shall issue such checks or drafts in excess of $100 shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one year nor more than five years.

(Missouri laws, 1917, pp. 244–245.)

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, as follows:

SECTION 1. Drawing check with intent to defraud—Misdemeanor—Penalty.—Any person who, with intent to defraud, shall make or draw or utter or deliver any check, draft, or order, for the payment of money, upon any bank or other depositary, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivering that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in, or credit with, such bank or other depositary for the payment of such check, draft, or order, in full, upon its presentation, shall be guilty of misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 2. Notice, five days, how evidence: As against the maker or drawer thereof, the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee, shall be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in, or credit with, such bank or other depositary, provided such maker or drawer shall not have paid the drawee thereof the amount due thereon (together with the drawee thereof the amount due thereon), together with all costs and protest fees, within five days after receiving notice that such check, draft, or order has not been paid by the drawee.

SEC. 3. Defining the word "credit": The word "credit," as used herein, shall be construed to mean an arrangement or understanding with the bank or depositary for the payment of such check, draft, or order.

Approved April 13, 1917.

(Utah Laws, 1913, ch. 26.)

ISSUING CHECK WITHOUT SUFFICIENT FUNDS FOR PAYMENT.

An act relative to the giving of checks or drafts on any bank or other depositary wherein the person so giving such check or draft shall not have sufficient funds or a credit for the payment of the same and providing a penalty therefor.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Utah—

SECTION 1. Issuing fraudulent check unlawful: Any person who, with intent to defraud, shall make or draw or utter or deliver any check, draft, or order for the payment of money upon any bank or other depositary, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivery that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depositary for the payment of such check, draft, or order in full upon its presentation, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

The making, drawing, uttering, or delivering of such check, draft, or order as aforesaid shall be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud. The word "credit," as used herein, shall be construed to mean an arrangement or understanding with the bank or depositary for the payment of such check, draft, or order.

Approved March 4, 1913.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation in reference to this proposed legislation is such that, technically speaking, the only question before the Senate is on concurring in the amendments of the House to the bill. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is right in that respect; and yet it seems to me, upon an examination of the bill which I have made since the debate has been proceeding here this morning, that it is eminently unfair and unjust, and really is a repeal, so far as such repeal can be made by statute passed by Congress, of the principle of the criminal law which prevails everywhere in civilized countries, that a man who is charged with a crime is always presumed to be innocent until it is shown beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty. It seems to me that we would be justified, if we could do so, even at this late stage, in preventing any action on the bill and letting it die a natural death.

I am not unmindful of the fact, Mr. President, that a great many of the States have statutes similar to the bill which it is now proposed to pass. In my judgment, while that is a proper argument to be adduced here, it is not conclusive of the justice of the proper legislation. In the first place, assuming that there is a law in the District of Columbia making it a criminal offense to obtain money under false pretenses—and I presume that is a fair presumption, though I am not familiar with the statute on the subject here; but all the States and all jurisdictions have statutes on the subject—assuming that to be true, we shall run no risk whatever if the entire proposed legislation shall be defeated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Code of the District of Columbia contains the statute which I shall now read, and which, in my opinion, is entirely adequate to meet the existing situation. The statute provides:

False pretenses. Whoever, by any false pretenses, with intent to defraud, obtains from any person anything of value, or procures the execution and delivery of any instrument of writing or conveyance of real or personal property, or the signature of any person as maker, indorser, or guarantor, to or upon any bond, bill, receipt, promissory note, draft, or check, or any other evidence of indebtedness, and whoever fraudulently sells, barters, or disposes of any bond, bill, receipt, promissory note, draft, or check, or other evidence of indebtedness, for value, knowing the same to be worthless, or knowing the signature of the maker, indorser, or guarantor thereof to have been obtained by any false pretenses, shall, if the value of the property or the sum or value of the money or property mentioned or described in the instrument so obtained, procured, sold, bartered, or disposed of is $35 or upward, be imprisoned not less than one year nor more than three years; or, if less than that sum, shall be fined not more than $200 or imprisoned for not more than six months or both. Any person who obtains any lodging, food, or accommodation at an inn, boarding house, or lodging house without paying therefor, with intent to defraud the proprietor or manager thereof, or who obtains credit at such an inn, boarding house, or lodging house by the use of any false pretense, or who, after obtaining credit or accommodation at such an inn, boarding house, or lodging house, absconds or surreptitiously removes his baggage therefrom without paying for his food, accommodation, or lodging, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the police court in the District of Columbia be fined not more than $100 or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both, in the discretion of said court.

So the Senator from Nebraska will see that for the District of Columbia there is a very broad statute punishing the obtaining of any money or anything of value by false or fraudulent pretenses or misrepresentations.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, under that statute if one should obtain money from a bank or obtain money from the Senator from Utah, for instance, by giving a check which was not good and under false pretenses, he could be punished. The fact that such a person gave a check when he had no money in the bank while it would not be conclusive would be a matter that could be proven; evidence could be offered on either side of the proposition, yet proof of the act itself would be proper evidence; and if the act were unexplained the evidence would be sufficient to obtain a conviction; and a conviction obtained on that kind of evidence would be sustained by any appellate court.

While I do not think the proposed portion of the statute is at all necessary, I should not have any objection to the language:

That any person within the District of Columbia who, with intent to defraud—

Those are the words which make the act criminal—"with intent to defraud." An intent in law is always proven by evidence of the actual act. One can not, of course, go into a man's heart and read there what his intent is, but his intent may be proven; and the only way his intent may be proven for the purposes of conviction is to show the acts which constitute the fraud. That always leaves it possible for the defendant, if he be innocent, to make a showing of what the facts really were, to show that his intent was different from what would naturally appear from his acts. The bill reads:

That any person within the District of Columbia who, with intent to defraud, shall make, draw, utter, or deliver any check, draft, or order for the payment of money upon any bank or other depository, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivering that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository for the payment of such check, draft, or order in full upon its presentation, shall be imprisoned for not more than one year, or be fined not more than $1,000, or both.

One of the House amendments is to strike out the word "imprisoned" and insert "guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment," and so forth.

If the proposed statute stopped there, I should not have any objection to it, although even that much would be unnecessary, for such a person could be convicted under the statute which has just been read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. That, however, Mr. President, is as far as we ought to go in order to be just and fair to anyone who might be charged under the language which follows in this proposed statute.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In view of the Senator's expression to the effect that he would have been satisfied with the bill if it had ended at the point he stated, I invite his attention to the fact that in most States—in fact, in all States, so far as I know—there is a distinction in the punishment inflicted in the case of a theft of a large amount and the case of the theft of a small amount; between petit larceny and grand larceny.

Mr. NORRIS. But this proposed statute would not make any such distinction.

Mr. KING. There is a distinction between the punishment of embezzlement of a large sum and a small amount. I asked the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] the other day if under this bill the punishment would not be the same if a person drew a check for 10 cents or $1 with intent to defraud or if he drew a check for $10,000 or $100,000 with like intent. Of course the Senator was compelled to answer affirmatively, but the Senator took refuge—I say it with all respect to the Senator—behind the proposition that discretion was lodged in the court, and that presumably the court would not inflict so severe a punishment upon the man who robbed of 10 cents as upon the man who robbed of $100,000; yet we know frequently, if I may be permitted to say so parenthetically, of the infirmity of judges and the severity with which sometimes the most insignificant offenses are punished.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator from Florida interrupts me I wish to discuss for a moment the question which the Senator from Utah has raised.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely wish to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in a moment, but not now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has made a very pertinent point, although I would not vote against the bill on that ground. Several years ago Congress revised the criminal statutes of the United States, and in that revision, after a great deal of debate and discussion, minimum penalties were omitted. The Senator from Utah will find upon examination of the revised criminal code that minimum penalties are omitted, and a larger discretion is vested in the court. The usual provision is that the person found guilty shall be fined in a sum not exceeding a certain amount, only the maximum being stated. I thought Congress made a mistake when it did that. I agree with the Senator from Utah that the amount involved ought to be taken into consideration by the statute itself; but those of us who held that opinion were voted down. So the provisions of the bill now before us in that respect are in harmony with the existing revised criminal code. It was the idea that the court having such discretion would inflict a punishment according to the circumstances of each case, and would be moved, to some extent at least, by the amount of money involved. While I think that often gives to a court a discretion which I should like to see modified to some extent by providing a limitation as to the amount involved, it must be said in favor of the House amendments to the pending measure that they correspond with the general terms of the revision of all the criminal statutes of the United States.

However, Mr. President, it is provided in the pending bill as follows:

As against the maker or drawer thereof the making—

Now, the bill sets up evidence, and that is always a dangerous thing for a legislative body to do. The bill embodies a statement as to what shall constitute a certain crime by setting forth the evidence that may be offered and by saying that if such and such evidence is produced such and such a conclusion must follow. It is always a dangerous thing for a legislative body to set forth what shall be necessary to constitute sufficient evidence to bring about a conviction.

As against the maker or drawer thereof the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering by such maker or drawer of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee because of insufficient funds of the maker or drawer in its possession or control, shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository, provided such maker or drawer shall not have paid the holder thereof the amount due thereon, together with the amount of protest fees, if any, within five days after receiving notice in person, or writing, that such draft, or order, has not been paid.

Mr. President, it is not necessary to set forth in a proposed statute even the first portion of that statement, that the acts specified shall make a prima facie case. Under the first part of the proposed statute I have read the court in trying a man charged for issuing a check to meet which he had no funds would admit in evidence the statement of the bank officials that there were not sufficient funds in the bank to pay the check, the court would admit in evidence the fact that the check had been protested, and the conclusion that the defendant had not in the bank an amount sufficient to meet the check drawn by him. That would be proper evidence, and, if unexplained, would be sufficient upon which to sustain a verdict of guilty, and any court would, in substance, so instruct the jury. However, Mr. President, when we say to the defendant, "If you do a certain thing it shall be prima facie evidence of your guilt, but it shall not be prima facie evidence of your guilt if you make good financially within five days," we are putting into the criminal law a proposition which, in my judgment, can not be defended anywhere in the civilized world, no matter how many State statutes there are that make such a provision. If we say, "You are guilty if the bank says you have no money on deposit but if you pay the bank the money you are free of guilt," that enables the man who has rich relatives and who commits a crime of this kind to escape punishment entirely by paying money, while the man without any financial resources who commits a similar crime must go to jail and suffer the penalty.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am quite in sympathy with the last suggestion of the Senator, but I am wondering if I read this provision correctly or whether the Senator may not be mistaken in his construction of it. The first part of this bill clearly declares that there must be intent to defraud when a check is drawn without funds to meet it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The provision which the Senator has been discussing, commencing in line 4, is in the same terms. It is not a new paragraph. It occurs to me if I were the court and the matter were presented to me I should conclude that the provision in regard to intent applied to the last provision the same as it did to the first.

So far as evidence being prima facie, I can see why that is put in the bill, but I do not like the last provision that a man may escape punishment if within five days, although he be guilty of a fraudulent intent, he may refund the money and escape punishment. That is the provision to which I object. The rest of it seems to me to be technical. It does not seem to me that the statute could be construed as a whole as applying to anything but intent; but I can see that it might be desirable——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me at this point?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a moment; let me finish. I can see that it might be desirable that proof that there was no money in the bank when the check was drawn should be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the Senator from Michigan that I would not have any objection to putting in the statute a provision that a certain state of facts shall be prima facie evidence, but I would much rather leave it out, because even if we do not state it, it is true as a matter of law, and the court will tell the jury so if it is unexplained. I do not think it adds anything to state it in the statute; but I would not quibble a moment about this bill if there were nothing else but that in it, because those of you who have had experience in or observation of the trial of men for obtaining money under false pretenses or almost any other crime realize that intent is always part of a crime, as a general proposition, and that it is never, or very seldom, at least, except where a man has confessed, possible for the prosecution to prove intent except by acts of the defendant and circumstances. Ordinarily that is the only way in which an intent can be proven, and if a man draws a check on a bank and has nothing in the bank to pay it and you stop right there and have no other evidence the presumption probably would be, and ought to be, that the man knew he did not have any money there; but that is only a presumption. It does not follow, because he has done that, that it is absolutely true.

Very often, Mr. President, there is a dispute between the depositor and the bank as to whether or not he has any credit. Frequently lawsuits grow out of a dispute of that kind, where the bank will say to Mr. A, "You have nothing to your credit in the bank," and Mr. A asserts that he has. It is a question upon which honest men may disagree and they may litigate over it; but under this bill the fact that the bank says that Mr. A has no money there makes him a criminal unless he buys the payee off with money.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Referring to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, he and I are entirely in accord upon the last proposal, that it is vicious to permit a man who draws a check with the intent to defraud some one to compound his wrongful act by making good the amount of which he sought to defraud the party. I think that is vicious in principle; and it is disclosed by the fact suggested by the Senator from Nebraska that the man who is fortunate enough to have friends who are able to make payment, or who himself possesses funds that will enable him to make payment, can go unwhipped of justice when he ought to be punished. Do Senators see the point? When he ought to be punished, when he discovers that he is likely to be punished, he escapes the penalty by paying; but the man who has not the money and can not get the money has to suffer the penalty.

We are in accord upon the last proposition; but I want to point out to the Senator from Michigan wherein I think the first proposition is vicious. Under the existing statute, if one draws a check with intent to defraud, he can be punished, and the burden of proof is upon the Government to establish the intent. Under the proposed modification of law carried in this bill the burden of proof is reversed. The presumption of guilt arises upon the refusal of a bank to pay a check which perhaps it ought to pay. As suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, disputes frequently arise as to accounts in bank; and under this bill the presumption of guilt arises, and then the party must establish his innocence. The ordinary rule as to the burden of proof is reversed, and the burden is placed upon the party accused to establish his innocence, rather than upon the Commonwealth or the Government to prove the material allegations in the indictment.

As suggested before, the vice in this proposition is that occasionally men who are entirely innocent happen to overdraw their accounts. I doubt if there is a Senator present who has not occasionally overdrawn his account without an express arrangement with the bank to meet the overdraft. If you pass this bill, every overdraft under such circumstances becomes a crime.

Mr. FLETCHER. Provided the amount is not made good within five days.

Mr. ROBINSON. Provided the amount is not made good within five days; that is true. The point I rose to make, however, was that the vice in the first proposition is that it shifts the burden of proof to establish the intent from the State, where it ought to be, and imposes it upon the defendant.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as showing how easily there might arise between a bank and a depositor a dispute in which all the parties are perfectly honest, I remember an actual occurrence in litigation that happened where a man doing business with a bank and having a checking account signed as security with one of his neighbors a note payable to the same bank. He gave no attention to the note. I presume he forgot it, supposing that the man who ought to pay it would pay it. The note came due, however, and as far as the face of the note was concerned he was just as liable as the other man. There was no difference as a matter of law. The note came due, and the bank, as it had a legal right to do, charged it up against his account, and when he drew a check in the course of his business there was no money there to pay it. He did not know it. He did not believe it was possible when it occurred. It never occurred to him that that operation had taken place, and yet it was a legal thing that had transpired.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator whether he ever before knew of any proposed criminal law under which the act of a person who occupies, as it were, an antagonistic position to another, could create prima facie guilt of felony on the part of the latter person?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of any case except in statutes similar to this. There are quite a number of similar statutes in the States. This statute would do that very thing.

Mr. SHIELDS. A thousand cases may occur where there is a difference between a depositor and a bank——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and they may be perfectly honest disputes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Perfectly honest—and the bank would refuse to pay the check, awaiting a settlement of matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. They are both honest; and yet, by that act of the banker, he makes prima facie his depositor a felon. It seems to me the most monstrous proposition I ever heard of being presented in a legislative body.

Mr. NORRIS. Prima facie the man who drew the check would be guilty of a crime. I would not say anything about it if it were not for the fact that this whole thing is unnecessary. No criminal can escape because of the nonpassage of this bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether or not there is any law now applying to the District of Columbia which specifically makes it a felony to draw a check on a bank with intention to defraud?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is not stated, as I understand, in the way of a check; but there is the ordinary statute here which provides that anyone who obtains money or other thing of value under false pretenses is guilty of a crime. Under that kind of a statute a man can be prosecuted for drawing a check on a bank where he has no funds.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have seen many cases, however, where there would be some difficulty in proving the case, where there were no express representations whatever, where there was simply the passage of a check and nothing at all was said. The most that could be said about that would be that there was an implied representation; and the question is more or less of a doubtful one under some circumstances whether or not you can send a man to the penitentiary for false pretenses when those pretenses are merely implied and not expressed.

I appreciate fully the force of what has been said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and also by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and others, that it is wrong to make a felony of an act which is not in itself a crime at all, where there is no intent to commit a crime, and where the transaction may be absolutely honest; but, notwithstanding that, it does seem that there ought to be a law in the District of Columbia specifically making it a crime for a man with intent to defraud to issue a check which he has no funds to pay.

Mr. NORRIS. In answer to the Senator, I will say that there is no doubt whatever in my mind but that the facts stated by the Senator already constitute a crime under the laws applying to the District of Columbia. The difficulty of proving the intention will not be relieved if instead of providing in general terms that a man who obtains money or other thing of value under a false pretense shall be guilty of a crime. We say that a man who draws a check where he has no money, with intent to defraud, is guilty of a crime. In one case it is more general; the first case I gave includes the latter one, and if we could have only one of the laws we ought to have the first one. I should have no objection to having both of them, but the difficulty of making proof and proving the intent is just the same in each case. If, under the statute as it exists now, you charge a man with obtaining money or other thing of value under false pretenses, and in making your proof you show that he drew a check on a bank where he had no funds, and that the payee, relying on that check, accepted it at its face value and turned over something of value to the man who drew it, you would be able to prove his intent just as easily as though you specifically provided that by drawing a check without funds, with intent to defraud, he would be guilty of a crime. In either case you would have to prove something from which the evil intent could be presumed, and in the case of drawing a check the court undoubtedly would tell the jury that the man who draws a check and presents it to some one for money or value is presumed as a matter of law, when he gives it to the person who takes it, to represent by that very act that his check is good, that it will be paid when presented, and that he has the money or the credit there with which it will be met when it is presented at the bank.

If the proof stopped there, if no further evidence were offered, the court would tell the jury that they had a right to presume, with no other evidence before them, that the money was obtained contrary to the provisions of the statute. In other words, the proof of obtaining money under false pretenses may be a direct promise, may be the giving of a note that is forged or a check which is no good, or something else which is valueless, under circumstances, whether direct or implied, that whatever it was was of value, and was to be paid or redeemed according to the statement on its face.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Senator from Nebraska looked up the law on that subject?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not had anything to do with a lawsuit of that kind for a good many years, but I have tried a good many such cases.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Senator tried a good many cases where a man was prosecuted for obtaining money under false pretenses merely because he gave a check that was not good?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have tried several such cases.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I confess I have not examined the law on the subject, but it seems to me that there might be some doubt, where the question of the commission of a felony was concerned, where the charge was that a man obtained money under false pretenses, and the facts were that he did not make any pretense whatever, that he did not say anything whatever, except by implication.

Mr. NORRIS. That is of itself a pretense, and one in writing. If it were true that the man did not intend to defraud by his check, if there were no more evidence offered except what is suggested by the Senator from Washington, probably a denial under oath on the part of the defendant would be sufficient, but if he has an opportunity to be heard and remains silent, you have a right to presume that when he delivered the check he intended to have the drawee believe that the check was good and that he had the money in the bank.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this bill is a vicious one, and I do not think we ought to pass it. I realize it has got to the point where we can not stop it, but I would like to see it remain where it is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. At least, it ought to be amended.

Mr. NORRIS. It certainly ought to be amended before it is passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to call attention to one criticism or objection raised by the Senator from Utah, in line 1, page 2, where the House amendment strikes out the word "imprisoned" and inserts the words "guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment."

If the Senator from Washington thinks he can get a vote on the bill before 2 o'clock, I will not talk longer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know, I am sure; but I hope to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment of the House makes the offense a misdemeanor, so that the danger of having a defendant punished as for a felony does not exist, under this bill. The point was raised that a check might be given for an insignificant amount, and that a person would be punished just the same for violating the statute as if the check were given for a larger amount, and the fraud, of course, was of very much greater consequence. I am simply calling attention to the fact that the House amendment makes the offense a misdemeanor in any case, so that it would be largely with the judge to determine whether or not the defendant would be punished by imprisonment or by a fine, or both, and that, of course, would depend largely on the whole transaction, the circumstances, the amount involved, the extent of the fraud, and the extent of the offense. By agreeing to the House amendment, we would provide that the penalty should be for a misdemeanor.

As to the second part of the bill, which makes the giving, making, drawing, uttering, or delivering of a check, draft, or order prima facie evidence, where there are not sufficient funds, I can not see any real basis for the objection to that provision. The matter of good faith can be easily covered by the proviso. If a mistake has been made, all one has to do is to rectify it by making good the balance in bank, where he has given a check overdrawing his account. If there is not good faith, if there has been no mistake made, why is it unreasonable to provide in the law that the fact of having given a check on a bank where there were not sufficient funds to meet it shall be regarded as prima facie evidence, not conclusive proof at all, but prima facie evidence, of intent to defraud, and especially where there is no understanding or arrangement with the bank that the account might be overdrawn? If there is an understanding or an agreement with the bank that the account might be overdrawn, or where the funds have been made sufficient to meet the draft or check given, there is not prima facie proof of fraud at all, and no case is made out. It seems to me that is sufficient protection for the honest man, for the man who really intended to commit no fraud. I think the bill is a good one, and that the amendments ought to be concurred in and the bill should become a law.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Has the Senator in mind the great, all-embracing presumption of innocence, which, of course, applies to all human transactions? If in a given case a presumably honest man draws a check and overdraws his account, entirely through mistake, why should that naked fact give rise to any presumption or be held prima facie evidence of guilty intent?

Mr. FLETCHER. My claim is that it does not in itself. You must construe the proviso as a part of this provision. The giving of the check is not held to be prima facie evidence of fraud, provided, where a mistake has been made, the balance is made good within five days time.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will put the question in a somewhat different form. Let me suppose that any one of us here should draw a check upon our home bank, and, not being familiar with the state of our account, the check would overdraw our account. The check is deposited in the mail and pursues its way to the home bank. Perhaps, however, it passes through many hands, and is slow in arriving at its destination. In the meantime the drawer of the check has departed from Washington, gone his way; it may be on official business of this body, and receives no notice of the fact that his account is overdrawn. I understand the bill contains some provision for notice to the drawer of the fact of the overdrawing of his account.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it does.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In such a supposititious case, wherein is there any justice in the provision of the bill, as I understand it, that the fact that the drawing of the check, after the notice referred to, even, shall give rise to a presumption of guilty intent or be prima facie evidence of fraud? I understand the bill contains a provision of that character. I may be in error, but if such is the scope of the intended act, then I submit for the consideration of the Senator, is that a proper or a right or a just provision?

May I answer, in part, my own question? Is it not conceivable that the reputation of the most honorable man might be sullied if such a law were enforced strictly? Is it not easily conceivable that any one of us might be brought into that very disagreeable and embarrassing situation? It seems to me so.

Mr. FLETCHER. In answer to that, in the first place, there would be no danger of any prosecution upon prima facie evidence only. No bank, no institution, no individual would institute a prosecution against any man, and especially a gentleman or a corporation or an association of reputation and standing, where they had only prima facie proof of fraud. This does not open the way for prosecution, but it does provide for a case of actual fraud, where the purpose and intention was to overdraw when the parties knew there were not sufficient funds, when the original idea was to get money on a check or a draft or to have it function as money, when the party giving the draft did not have the money. The statute would provide under this bill that a prima facie case was made out where the check was drawn and there were not sufficient funds, for instance, and in the instance the Senator mentions, only prima facie then, provided, upon notice, the Senator had overdrawn his account and he failed to make good that account. That would only be a prima facie case, and there would be no prosecution, in any event, based purely upon a prima facie case. It would be folly upon the part of anyone to institute a prosecution under such circumstances, because he would be liable himself to suit for malicious prosecution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I suggest this to the Senator: I am not concerned with the ultimate outcome of such a prosecution——

Mr. FLETCHER. That is, where the injury to one's reputation would arise by a prosecution for fraud for violating the statute.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely. I have not before my eye the provision as to notice, as to whether it shall be personal, actual notice, received by the drawer of the supposed check; but if it requires personal notice and receipt of the notice, that is one thing. In any event, however, if the statute provides for prima facie evidence, that would, I submit, induce the initiation of proceedings against a given man which would cause injury to his reputation. It is not necessarily a presumption, but it shifts the burden of proof.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is precisely what the bill would do, and that is all it would do, and I think that in those circumstances the burden of proof ought to be shifted. Where a check has been given or a draft made upon a bank where there were not sufficient funds to meet the check or the draft, and after notice given and demand made, and all that, and where there had been no understanding or arrangement as to credits or anything of that sort, why should those things not be held to make out a prima facie case of fraud?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Just a final word, if the Senator will permit me. I can conceive of a case where a most honorable man might, through mistake, overdraw his account and be properly notified of that fact and be unable to make it good within the time specified; but under such circumstances the mere failure to make good ought not to be prima facie evidence of a guilty intent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not care to discuss the unfinished business, and as the morning hour has expired and I have been interrupted I shall not say anything further at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the status of the motion to concur in the House amendments? Will it have any special position to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it will not.

Mr. KING. May I not suggest that this is in the nature of a conference report?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it is not a conference report; it is a motion to concur in the House amendments. The matter is on the table. I suppose it goes back to the table and remains there, to be taken up on motion or otherwise.

CLAIMS FOR OCCUPATION OF BUILDINGS BY NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, on June 18, 1918, the Secretary of the Navy issued a commandeering order directing that certain business concerns in the city of New York vacate their premises and buildings which they were occupying so that the Navy Department might occupy those premises for war purposes. Those concerns did vacate their premises and suffered considerable loss. Subsequently I introduced a number of bills relieving them from those losses.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], until recently chairman of the Committee on Claims, reported a resolution on November 9 of this year, which is Order of Business 319, directing that those bills introduced by me in connection with this matter be referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact, and then to be referred back to the Senate with their finding of fact.

I rise now to request my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] to agree to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business in order that I may ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that resolution. If it leads to any debate, I shall not press it.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that more than a year ago, nearly two years ago, we passed a bill which authorized a certain board in the War Department to consider, pass upon, and adjust all valid claims growing out of the activities of the War Department. May I inquire of the Senator whether or not the powers of that board are not sufficiently comprehensive to enable them to pass upon the claims to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SPENCER. I understand they are not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This comes under the Navy Department.

Mr. SPENCER. The purpose of the resolution is merely to allow the Court of Claims to pass upon the facts, and then, as it is expressly provided in the resolution, report back those findings to Congress.

Mr. CALDER. And then Congress will be called upon to appropriate the money as indicated by the report of the Court of Claims.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire of the Senator whether he regards that as safe legislation and a proper precedent?

Mr. SPENCER. Not only, may I say to the Senator from Utah, is it safe legislation and a proper precedent, but it is the only fair way to act. Here are these claimants who allege that they have just claim against the Government, and the Navy Department says, "perhaps they have, we do not know." What could be more fair than that those claimants should be allowed to have their claims presented to a court which is our creation for the ascertainment of the real facts?

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to call attention to the fact that the bill does not provide for the payment of any judgment. It merely provides for a finding of fact. That has frequently been done before.

Mr. CALDER. It is a practice that has been in existence since the law of March 3, 1911, was passed. There are numerous cases of this kind.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I merely wish to remark that it is clearly evident that the resolution will lead to controversy. The unfinished business is the joint resolution concerning the Argentine sugar proposition, and I think we had better finish that, for evidently, there being three or four Senators now on their feet, we can not pass the Senator's resolution without extended discussion.

Mr. CALDER. If there is further discussion I shall not ask further consideration of it, of course.

Mr. KING. Let me suggest to the Senator from New York that he defer his request until we get through with the sugar matter, and then if he will renew it I shall not object.

Mr. CALDER. Very well; I withdraw the request for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House passed a bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DISPOSITION OF SUGAR IMPORTED FROM ARGENTINA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I wish briefly to discuss the pending resolution offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I would refrain entirely from occupying any of the time of the Senate if it were not for the splendid argument made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on yesterday. I think his argument, while perhaps in law sound to a very large extent, yet is not applicable to the matter attempted to be adjusted by reason of this legislation.

If I gained correctly the thought of the Senator from Montana yesterday, though I have not had an opportunity to read his speech in the RECORD, it was that the President was not authorized by reason of any existing statutes to purchase sugar. That was brought out by a statement to which I call his attention, made by former Attorney General Palmer, which I read at that time, and is, I think, the basis of the argument brought up by the Senator from Montana. It is found at page 13 of the joint committee hearings on agriculture under Senate joint resolution 238. The Attorney General, speaking to that committee, said in part as follows:

> Under the Lever Act the President was empowered to use any agencies that he might see fit to purchase supplies of necessaries of this kind, especially sugar.

Mr. President, this statement was not in reference to the Sugar Equalization Board, but was with particular reference to the attitude and the action of the Department of Justice and the Department of State in inducing the claimants under this joint resolution to purchase the particular sugar in question. I think the Senator from Montana argued, and correctly, that the Attorney General was wrong. I do not believe there is any section of the Lever Act directly authorizing or empowering the President to acquire sugar by purchase. That far I go with the distinguished Senator. It may be that in section 10 and section 2 of the Lever Act there are implied powers which would grant to the President the right to acquire sugar through some department of the Government. Particularly this might be said with reference to section 10. As I recall the hearings before the committee investigating the sugar situation, section 10 and section 2 were referred to by the Attorney General as giving him plenary power to acquire sugar by some public act of the President of the United States.

It is true, and I think the distinguished Senator from Montana will agree, that the President, exercising the authority of the Lever Act, had a right to purchase the Cuban crop of sugar under the Sugar Equalization Board. In section 2 the law plainly specifies that the President may create agencies to perform those things required of him in the Lever Act. That agency was the incorporation, under the laws of Delaware, of an organization known as the Sugar Equalization Board. Indeed, that board did function and no question was raised in the Congress. The board even went to the extent in the years 1917 and 1918 of purchasing the crop of sugar for the consumption of the American people.

It even went further. The Sugar Equalization Board, feeling the strength of the power vested in it by the Congress under the Lever Act, required a license for all those who were selling sugar at retail and at wholesale. They, indeed, went further and fixed a particular price, a maximum, which the sugar refiners could charge for refining sugar.

Congress recognized the power of the President to function under the Lever Act through the administration of the law by the Equalization Board, because, in December, 1919, the Congress, without reference being made to the right of the President to operate the agency known as the Sugar Equalization Board, extended that power for one year until December, 1920. That extension was written upon the statute books and not a voice was raised on the floor of the Senate against its legality. It passed the House, but the President refused to employ it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what was the date when this sugar transaction took place?

Mr. McNARY. I would speak from memory, but I think in August, 1920.

Mr. SMITH. That was when the purchase was made in Argentina?

Mr. McNARY. The purchase was made in May.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator recall how long this licensing feature obtained after the cessation of war or after the armistice?

Mr. McNARY. My memory is unreliable, because events were occurring with such great rapidity that I forget dates. It is not important, I think, at any rate.

Mr. SMITH. It is important to this extent. The reason why I ask is that quite a bit of the argument has hinged upon the fact that this was not during the time of actual war and was after the armistice. I was anxious to know just how long the powers of the Equalization Board were extended. The Senator has just said it was until December, 1920. Did the matter of apportionment and licensing of sugar extend after the armistice was declared?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. The Senator must well know, as a very distinguished citizen of his State and an active participant in matters of legislation, he being a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of this provision of the Lever Act that it should remain in force until peace was made with Germany and promulgated by the President. There is no question about that, but that is not involved here in any way.

I quite agree with the judgment of the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is an eminent lawyer, that the President technically did not have any authority under the Lever Act to purchase sugar or to authorize the Department of Justice or the Secretary of State to acquire this particular lot of sugar. But the President did have the right to and did function legally through the medium of the Sugar Equalization Board, though I am not claiming it had anything to do with this particular purchase. So I think as a matter of law there is no disagreement between the Senator from Montana and myself as the matter presents itself at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Oregon why it was that the Sugar Equalization Board, having been created for the purpose of dealing with the subject of sugar and at the time functioning, in that connection exercising whatever authority was conferred upon the President in relation to sugar, was entirely ignored in this transaction and passed by and had absolutely no knowledge of the matter at all, and the Attorney General conducted it.

Mr. McNARY. I would answer that by saying to the Senator from Montana——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The purchase of the Cuban sugar in 1917–18 was made through the Sugar Equalization Board. The purchase of the Cuban crop the next succeeding year was made through the same board. Just why was that board passed up and why did the President assume to act in the matter?

Mr. McNARY. I think I can answer that; perhaps not to the satisfaction of the Senator from Montana, but to the satisfaction of the Senator from Oregon.

In the execution of the Lever Act the President created what was known as the Food Administration. That was in August, 1917, as I recall the date. About two years later the authority to function under the Lever Act was transferred from the Food Administration to the Department of Justice by order of the President. I think that is a satisfactory answer, but I may go further if the Senator will let me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. In the hearings before the Senate Agricultural Committee Mr. Zabriskie and Judge Glasgow told the committee repeatedly that they were desirous of getting out of business and settling up their affairs. While they had a legal status and were a legal entity at that time, they were not functioning, the only functioning organization under the Lever Act being then the Department of Justice.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon will bear in mind that during all of the period during which the Sugar Equalization Board was functioning we had a food controller; that notwithstanding we had a food controller dealing with the subject of foods generally, a Sugar Equalization Board was created to deal with the subject of sugar especially, and that the two functionaries, if they may be so denominated, operated concurrently. Although the food controller was in existence, nevertheless, sugar transactions were conducted through the Sugar Equalization Board. The situation was in no respect different when the food controller's authority was transferred to the Attorney General. The Sugar Equalization Board still remained, and I was curious to know whether some intimation had not come from the Sugar Equalization Board that they did not care to undertake that kind of a transaction, in view of the law impliedly forbidding their doing so.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I think there was some inconsistency; there was duplication and some bad management, as the Senator knows, for he ought to know and does know much more about the Wilson administration than do I. I can not answer the question; but the condition then existing was consistent with much of the attitude and the conduct of that administration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not the question which I addressed to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I think that is a sufficient answer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No. It is true that duplication had occurred; we had a food controller and we had a sugar equalization board. In 1917–18 the Sugar Equalization Board made purchases and in 1918–19 the Sugar Equalization Board made purchases, but when it came to 1920, for some reason or other, the acting food controller stepped in and made the purchases.

Mr. McNARY. Now, I think I know precisely a complete answer, not that the answer which I have heretofore given has been incomplete. When we reached 1920 a law was passed bearing the name of the Senator now on the floor authorizing the Sugar Equalization Board to buy the sugar crop of Cuba.

In May, 1920, the President of the United States refused to direct the board to function, and they plainly said they would have nothing more to do with the sugar proposition unless the President would authorize them to go ahead and conduct the business. What did the President do? In November, 1919, when this matter was the subject of consideration by the Congress of the United States, the President issued a proclamation transferring the authority then invested in the Food Administration to the Department of Justice. That is when the Department of Justice insisted upon these claimants going in and buying the Argentine crop.

Mr. President, I again say I do not think the legal question is involved. I agree with the distinguished lawyer and Senator from Montana as against his Democratic friends who were high in authority during the last administration on that point. I want to repeat that it was the opinion expressed by Mr. Palmer, then Attorney General, that the President had sufficient authority to acquire the sugar, and that this claim should be paid.

I now turn to the opinion and statement of an eminent jurist, having a splendid legal education and a great sense of justice, Judge Glasgow, who was the attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board, the attorney for the Food Administration, and an eminent Democrat in the State of Pennsylvania. Reading from the hearings before the Joint Committee on Agriculture on Senate joint resolution 238, page 26, I quote from the testimony of Judge Glasgow:

It is the unanimous view of the board that these gentlemen—

Referring to the gentlemen mentioned in the joint resolution—have been dealt with pretty hardly and that their loss will be a vital one to them, and it was no fault of theirs; and if the committee feels that the sugar board ought to take this matter over we will gladly carry out the views of the committee and try to handle it the best we can.

But the committee did not see the wisdom of following the advice of the eminent jurist, and brought in the pending resolution, thinking that Congress could do the act just as well as the Sugar Equalization Board; but here is the view of Judge Glasgow that these men have been harshly dealt with and that the matter ought to be taken over and an adjustment made.

Senator Hoke Smith, who was then a Member of this body, propounded this inquiry:

You believe that the Government or the people ought to stand this loss rather than this firm?

Mr. GLASGOW. Undoubtedly, Senator.

Senator SMITH of Georgia. As it was intended as a service for all the people at the instance of the Department of Justice.

Mr. GLASGOW. I think so. I think if it had been an entirely commercial transaction with that amount of money involved, the hope of profit that they were going to get out of the transaction would not have justified their dealing.

Mr. President, referring to page 27 of the same document, I read further:

Mr. GLASGOW. I want to state that the first ground is the failure of the State Department to carry out the plans which it had inaugurated at the instance of the Department of Justice. That, I think, is an equitable view that, man to man, people are bound to consider.

The second is the failure of the State Department and the failure of the Department of Justice on the request of these gentlemen to permit them to dispose of the sugar which would, in the second case, have relieved the loss. If they had gotten it here this amount they have lost now would have been distributed all over the United States among the people who bought the sugar.

Mr. President, I might say that anyone who reads this record carefully will be impressed by the number of times Judge Glasgow spoke of this transaction as an equitable one and as a claim which should be paid. The same testimony practically was given by Mr. Zabriskie, who was president of the board, and the other distinguished Democrat whom I have mentioned, namely, Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, also spoke in a like vein.

The distinguished Senator from Montana referred to this not being a legal claim. I am one of those who entertain the same thought. I do not believe the company which is interested in this matter could go into the Court of Claims and bring a legal action against the Government; nor is that necessary. How many transactions, I may ask the Senator to state, during the war, when the great stress was on, when there was necessity for hurried action, were based upon the four corners of the statute law of the United States or on the common law? I will say, however, to the Senator that it matters not, in my opinion, whether this is a legal claim or not; it does not matter whether or not an action could be brought to maintain it in the Court of Claims by suing the United States; the question is, Should we pay it and is it an equitable claim?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I was not in the Chamber at the time the Senator began his remarks, and I do not know whether he has discussed the question of title, but I should like to ask him whether there is anything in the way of a cablegram or anything else issuing from the Government or any department of the Government that recognizes that the title to the sugar in question had vested in the Government?

Mr. McNARY. I think so, but I was going to read that a little later if the Senator will bear with me for a few moments.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I repeat that, in my opinion, it is not an essential element of this whole controversy as to whether the claimants could sue and win their case in the Court of Claims, or whether they would have any right in a court of law; the question is, Was there some department of the Government which, acting in a public way, gave these claimants reasonable cause to enter upon a transaction of this nature, so that these people in fact assumed a liability by which an indebtedness was created or a service rendered? I ask if there is any Senator present who would not think it sufficient in transacting business with a foreign country in time of peace to rely upon the word and the promise of the Department of Justice or the word and the promise and conduct of the Secretary of State? It was these two instrumentalities of government which imposed this burden and created the liability which attaches to this transaction at this time.

It does not matter whether there was a lawyer looking over the contract, and it does not matter whether it was signed by the President under specific authority of law, for the President thought he had authority of law. Mr. Palmer, who was the legal adviser of the administration, thought there was sufficient law, and Judge Glasgow, who was the attorney for the Food Administrator in the administration of the Lever Act and attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board, thought there was sufficient law. These gentlemen were Democrats, and the only eminent Democrat who has disagreed with that Democratic view is the distinguished Senator from Montana, with whom I am inclined to agree with respect to the legal proposition. But here, Mr. President, there were these two departments of the Government, advised by the distinguished men to whom I have referred, telling the company interested in this matter what to do and imploring and begging them to enter into this transaction.

Now, the question to my mind is, Does that create an equitable liability? If so, has the Supreme Court of the United States ever declared that the Congress has a right to meet an equitable claim? The Senator will remember the case decided by Judge Peckham, the case of United States against Realty Company, reported in One hundred and sixty-third United States, page 427, where the Supreme Court say that Congress has the legal right to meet a debt of the United States, and then the court, speaking further, say that a debt of the United States need not consist of a statutory obligation or one the terms of which were confined within a written contract, but it might be a contract such as is known as an equitable one or one of honorary obligation.

So, Mr. President, without repeating too often, I may say as my final deduction of the law: Beyond question the Lever Act did not authorize the President to purchase the sugar. Whether or not he entered into a contract to purchase through an instrumentality of the Government, it is true that he did have authority, operating through the Sugar Equalization Board, although that board did not enter into this transaction; and the three eminent advisers of the Government in some of its capacities advised the departments and advised the Congress of the United States that there was sufficient legal authority. Assuming, however, that there was no legal authority, could anyone say that these men were not brought into this transaction and assumed a liability under a contract which no reasonable man would turn down or question?

Having that in mind——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. If I may conclude in just a moment. Having that in mind, if that is not a correct deduction, the court has held that Congress can respect and must respect an obligation exactly similar in character, I say, to the one in question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not quite sure that I understood the Senator from Oregon, but I want to make certain. Does the Senator say that Mr. Glasgow asserted that the Attorney General had the authority to make this contract?

Mr. McNARY. I did not. I said that the Attorney General made that statement himself, which the Senator read yesterday and which I repeated to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Who are the "three eminent Democratic authorities," then, who have asserted that the Attorney General had the power to make this contract?

Mr. McNARY. I said that the three eminent Democratic authorities were the Attorney General, Mr. Palmer——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Palmer clearly so asserts.

Mr. McNARY. Judge Glasgow advised the members of the Senate Agricultural Committee, or the joint committee, that the claim should be paid.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is another matter.

Mr. McNARY. That is not another matter at all. When the man who was perhaps the most conspicuous lawyer in the great State of Pennsylvania came before a joint committee and said: "You ought to pay the claim; it is right," I do not think that is another matter at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not speaking about that.

Mr. McNARY. I am.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Attorney General clearly said that the Attorney General had the power. That is one Democratic authority. Of course the fact that it is Democratic authority does not make it a bit better so far as the proposition of law is concerned; but I have failed to find in the record anywhere the opinion of anyone but the Attorney General that he had the power.

Mr. McNARY. I said to the Senator from Montana that the President, by this promulgation, thought he gave authority to the Attorney General to operate under the Lever Act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly he did.

Mr. McNARY. And the distinguished Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, in doing this particular thing evidently thought there was sufficient authority.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But how does the Senator from Oregon reach the conclusion that the President of the United States—who apparently did not know anything more about this than I did at the time——

Mr. McNARY. I have an idea that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (continuing). Believed that the Attorney General had this power?

Mr. McNARY. I say that in transferring the authority from the Food Administrator to the Department of Justice I assume that the President knew what he was doing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McNARY. He must have thought that he was in fact turning over from one department to the other the principles that were embodied in the Lever Act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Nobody doubts or controverts that proposition.

Mr. McNARY. That is all right. That is as far as I go.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that is quite a different proposition from the question whether the President of the United States thought, in transferring to the Attorney General the powers granted to him under the Lever Act, that the Attorney General had the power to enter into this contract.

Mr. McNARY. I am not interested, and the Senator from Montana should not be interested, in what the President thought, or his state of mind. He is not involved in this controversy.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was simply interrogating the Senator from Oregon in reference to his statement that three great, eminent Democratic authorities have concurred in the view that the Attorney General had the power to make this contract.

Mr. McNARY. I think that is a reasonable inference, but I am not disturbed as to whether it is or not. The question is, Is this an equitable claim? Does it come within the scope of the duties or rights of the department?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; that is all.

Mr. McNARY. Has not the Supreme Court held that an equitable claim can be paid by Congress as well as a legal claim? Otherwise we agree upon the law of the case, and I think we agree upon that.

Mr. President, I promised to speak but a moment, and I have gone over my time. The Senator from Georgia has requested the reading of a cablegram that perhaps may be a matter of importance at this point, and I ask that it be read from the desk. I ask that the Secretary may read Exhibit 12.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

(Paraphrase of cablegram.)

TO AMERICAN EMBASSY AT BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA.

Dated August 12, 6 p. m. No. 88.

Reference is made to your No. 185 of August 6, and No. 186 of August 9.

(1) If approved by Sullivan, convey to the Government of Argentina that this Government desires to state again its appreciation of its favor in permitting the export of sugar to relieve necessities in this country; and that since the situation in the United States has been remedied, in large measure through the courteous act of the Argentine Government, and at the same time the market in Argentina appears to be suffering from a sugar shortage, this Government would be glad to resell to the Argentine Government, if it so desires, or on the market under its supervision, such quantities of sugar which have not already been exported to the United States; that the sugar is offered at 16 cents United States currency, and amounts to 4,383 tons. You may explain to the Argentine Government, if you think advisable, that the stated price is placed somewhat above purchase price in order to cover expenditures incidental to its handling, purchase, and storage.

(2) Please be careful to avoid giving impression which you warned against in your cablegram of July 29, No. 178.

(Signed) COLBY.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think that cablegram speaks for itself. It shows the effort that was being made to sell this sugar in the Argentine.

Mr. President, only one word more. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry considered this matter patiently, and, after an exhaustive hearing, reported favorably on the bill. The Senate passed it without much controversy at the last session. I can not see that any new facts have been developed or that anything has been presented to change the Senate's mind from that time to this.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, I heard the testimony given in connection with the so-called Argentine sugar case. This included the testimony of representatives of the Department of State, the Attorney General's office, and the Sugar Equalization Board. After hearing this testimony I came to the following practical conclusion:

The people of the United States consume about as much sugar as they do flour, say between four and five million tons per year, or nearly 400,000 tons per month. The price of sugar in March, 1920, had mounted in some extreme cases to 32 cents per pound. The plan outlined and carried out, under the direction of the President, by the State Department and the Attorney General's office, working through the medium of Howell & Co. and the American Trading Co., but under the absolute direction of the two departments, broke the corner on sugar. It saved the people of the United States nearly $80,000,000 in one month by reducing the price of sugar 10 cents a pound. In bringing about this saving of $80,000,000 per month to the people a loss of something like $1,000,000 has been incurred; and it is upon this loss that we are asked to legislate to-day.

There is no question about the facts in the case. A very able and highly technical legal argument was made yesterday by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], setting out that the Department of State and the Department of Justice had no legal power to break this corner in the manner they did. Perhaps that is so. Perhaps it would have been better to have handled the sugar business through the Sugar Equalization Board, which had functioned for a number of years and had accumulated a profit of some $38,000,000 now standing to the credit of the Government, and from which it is proposed to pay this item. The administration thought otherwise and ordered the Department of Justice to take charge. They did so. They controlled in a general way the price at which the sugar should be bought; they controlled absolutely the price at which it should be offered for sale, and dictated to whom it should be sold. They restricted the profits to less than 10 per cent of the amount of the actual cash which had to be provided, and out of this 10 per cent must be deducted the interest on the $6,000,000 invested in the sugar, which sum was borrowed from the banks at a high rate of interest in extremely critical financial times. By this transaction the people of the United States profited by hundreds of millions of dollars. The work was carried out in good faith and ably handled by the Department of Justice, the Department of State, and the agency they selected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY], who did me the honor to refer to some observations made by me on yesterday in this matter, perhaps did not hear what I said concerning the claim asserted here to the effect that this transaction broke the sugar market. I advised the Senate on yesterday that the Bureau of Markets do not take that view of the situation. They take the view of the situation that the sugar market broke just the same as the wool market broke, just the same as the live-stock market broke, just the same as the grain market broke, just the same as the cotton market broke, and for like reasons.

On yesterday I asserted that the so-called commission of 1 cent a pound which B. H. Howell, Son & Co. were to receive without the investment of a dollar on their part—that is, without risking a dollar—was an exorbitant thing. They contemplated making a profit of $1,400,000 upon the mere matter of acting as purchasing agents for the United States in the Argentine Republic—a margin of profit which I asserted was greater than the average profit made by the sugar refiners of this country who go to foreign countries, buy sugar, bring it to this country, refine it, and put it upon the market here.

I have before me, Mr. President, tables from a pamphlet issued by the United States Tariff Commission entitled "Refined sugar," found on page 17 thereof, which show the difference between the price of raw centrifugals in New York and the price of refined sugar for every year from 1880 to 1918. The profit runs from five-tenths of 1 cent to 1 15/16 cents. The average, I should say, was something less than 1 cent.

These people risk their money. They take continually all the chances of the fall of the market leaving them with a loss. B. H. Howell, Son & Co. represent that they were to take no chance at all; that they were simply buying as agents for the United States, the transaction to be carried out by the United States. As said by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY], the United States simply constituted them its agents for the purpose of carrying out the transaction.

I also desire, Mr. President, to read the brief report made by the minority of the House committee on House joint resolution No. 444, identical with the joint resolution now before the Senate—Senate joint resolution No. 12—made February 1, 1921. It is as follows:

This is a resolution the adoption of which would result in the Sugar Equalization Board paying to B. H. Howell, Son & Co. and the American Trading Co. a loss of more than $2,000,000, sustained by them in the purchase of Argentine sugar.

The American Trading Co., importers, with offices in the Argentine, introduced the subject of buying Argentine sugar for import to the State Department in April, 1920. They informed the State Department that there was at that time about 100,000 long tons of sugar in the Argentine for sale. Following this information the Department of Justice told the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co., distributors, that if they would undertake to buy and import about 70,000 tons of this sugar the Department of Justice would undertake, through the Department of State, to have the then existing Argentine embargo lifted so that the sugar could be brought to the United States. Nothing was said at that time about any profit or loss. Later, however, the Department of Justice informed these companies that as licensees under the food control act they would be limited to 2 cents per pound profit; that is, 1 cent per pound profit for each company.

Pursuant to this arrangement about 14,000 tons of sugar were actually purchased in the Argentine for around 13 cents per pound (whether in our money or not is not disclosed). In response to the activities of our State Department, the Argentine embargo was lifted within a very reasonable length of time, and a permit issued on the 23d of June to remove the sugar.

No further negotiations between the Government and these companies are disclosed until July 29, when a Mr. Franklin, representing the companies, suggested to the Government the desirability of selling a large portion of the sugar in the Argentine. This view was not concurred in by the Government, for the reaosn that this purchase, and anticipated purchases, had already materially inflated sugar prices in the Argentine. As early as August 12, however, the Secretary of State consented to the sale of the sugar in the Argentine. The evidence fails to disclose any offer to sell any portion of it for less than 16 cents per pound, although the 13 cents paid for the sugar included in addition to the actual purchase price all expense incident to assembling it. It is, therefore, evident that the price asked contemplated a profit of over $900,000, being a much larger profit than the companies claim they hoped to get by bringing the sugar to the United States.

Failing in this effort to sell the sugar in the Argentine at an unreasonable profit, the companies then brought the sugar to the United States. The price of sugar in the United States having fallen in the meantime, the companies were unable to dispose of it in this country at a profit. They then undertook to induce the Sugar Equalization Board to take over the entire transaction and save them harmless. Failing in this, they have appealed to Congress, and seek through this resolution to avoid any loss by having the Government assume it through the Sugar Equalization Board.

During this whole transaction the Sugar Equalization Board was in existence and had in its treasury more than $40,000,000.

We submit:

(1) That if the Sugar Equalization Board can now be called upon to assume this transaction with its assured loss, it could with propriety have been called upon in the beginning to assume the responsibility and take the contemplated profit of more than $600,000.

(2) Thousands of individuals and companies did, as a result of the war and the appeals of the Government, engage in new and unusual activities, actuated by patriotism as well as a desire to profit. Incalculable loss has resulted. In our judgment this claim has no more merit than thousands of others that are pending or may be presented in the years to come. To allow this claim would, in our judgment, set a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am reading from the minority report on a resolution in the House, a counterpart of this one. I may say in this connection that I am told that other claims are pending which are substantially like this on similar contracts entered into with other companies for the purchase of sugar in foreign countries.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator state how many out of the 21 members of the committee signed that report?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was about to read the names. Four members signed the report. The report continues:

(3) It is admitted that these companies have no legal claim against the Government. It is also admitted that no one, acting for the Government, ever directly or impliedly guaranteed either of these claimants against loss.

(4) This claim may be summed up with the following statement:

These claimants undertook, through the good offices of the Department of Justice and the Department of State, to bring into the United States from Argentina a large amount of sugar, upon which they expected to realize an enormous profit. Failing in this and facing a loss, they now turn to the Government and ask to be relieved of that loss and have the Government assume the burden.

G. N. HAUGEN.
FRED S. PURNELL.
J. N. TINCHER.
M. O. McLAUGHLIN.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, in reference to the cablegram read by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], it must have occurred to him that it either proves nothing or proves too much. If it proves nothing, of course, it will go out, be disregarded; but if it proves anything at all, it proves that the Government recognized this sugar as its own property. In that case the remedy would be not by this joint resolution but by some other method.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Unless somebody wants to discuss the general features of the joint resolution, I move to amend by striking out, on page 2, lines 1 and 2, the words "thirteen thousand nine hundred and two" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "nine thousand."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "thirteen thousand nine hundred and two" and insert the words "nine thousand."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This amendment is founded upon the testimony of Mr. Lorenzo D. Armstrong, representing B. H. Howell, Son & Co., found at page 4 of the hearings before the Joint Committee on Agriculture, where he testified as follows:

Through circumstances over which they had no control the transaction went astray as far as the commercial interests were involved. It accomplished the public purpose, and millions of dollars were saved to the American consumer by it, but through difficulties with the Argentine Government the sugar was not brought up as planned, and 9,000 tons of that sugar remain on hand unsold, involving a loss to these commercial iterests of some $1,800,000.

Apparently the claimants do not claim to have on hand any more than 9,000 tons of sugar to be taken over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator if that amendment if adopted would not be to the disadvantage of the Government? This has come up rather suddenly, if I may say so, but according to my recollection the testimony is that these people brought something like 5,000 tons of sugar to the United States and sold it and I think made some profit per pound on the sugar sold. The joint resolution as drafted instructs the President to in turn instruct the Sugar Equalization Board to take over the entire transaction. If the companies have sold 5,000 tons of sugar at a profit, out of 13,902 tons mentioned in the joint resolution, the Sugar Equalization Board, in taking over the whole transaction and making good the net loss to these companies, will take into account the profit they made on the 5,000 tons. I think it is not to the advantage of the Government to eliminate from the Sugar Equalization Board's jurisdiction, as it were, the inclusion of that profit, if such were made, on the sugar that was sold.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to cooperate with the Senator from New York in bringing about the result he would like to attain, but I submit to him that it can not be achieved by the language of this joint resolution. This does not authorize the Sugar Equalization Board to call B. H. Howell, Son & Co. to account for any sugar which they have disposed of. It just authorizes the Sugar Equalization Board to take over——

Mr. WADSWORTH. The entire transaction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Thirteen thousand tons of sugar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. To take over the entire transaction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; it does not say the entire transaction. It says 13,000 tons of sugar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it says the entire transaction; "to take over, from the corporation, American Trading Co., and the copartnership, B. H. Howell, Son & Co., a certain transaction."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What is meant by the expression "to take over a certain transaction"?

Mr. WADSWORTH. On line 10 the bill reads:

Which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 13th day of May, 1920, and the 22d day of May, 1920, of 13,902 tons of sugar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If B. H. Howell, Son & Co. sold 5,000 tons at a loss, then we would have to sustain a loss. What information has the Senator as to a profit having been made on this 5,000 tons and how much was the profit?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not tell. Mr. Glasgow was rather careful to emphasize before the committee the importance of the Sugar Equalization Board having power to act upon the whole transaction. Five thousand tons were sold.

Mr. McNARY. I think that question is not pertinent under the circumstances, because it appears plainly that there was no loss on the 5,000 tons. The joint resolution refers to the whole undertaking as a transaction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My recollection is that all, or a considerable part, of the 5,000 tons that were sold reached this country prior to the very severe drop in the domestic price of sugar, and that they managed to persuade some of the consumers, a list of whom was given to these people by the Government, to take the sugar at 20 cents, or whatever was the agreed rate. Upon that, my very clear impression is, they made some money, perhaps the full cent a pound. If the 5,000 tons is eliminated from the jurisdiction of the Sugar Equalization Board, then the board would be unable to charge against these companies the money which they made on the 5,000 tons. I think it would be a dangerous amendment, I say very frankly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say that the expression "to take over the transaction" is a rather indefinite way of expressing the idea the Senator has in mind.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was the language especially desired by Mr. Glasgow, of the board, in order to protect the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the passage of Senate joint resolution 12.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to address a question to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. Assuming that this company has on hand 9,000 tons of this sugar which is to be turned over to the Sugar Equalization Board, to be sold, of course, and disposed of by that board, can the Senator tell us how present prices compare with prices in August, 1920?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are much lower.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Much lower?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, of course, the loss will be more than 2 cents a pound?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator tell us how much lower? At 2 cents a pound the loss would be $360,000 on 9,000 tons. That is the testimony before the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Is there any testimony as to what they paid for it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They paid 13 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. If they paid 13 cents, the loss would be 11 cents a pound. Anyone can buy raw Cuban sugar to-day for 2 cents a pound.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would be $220 a ton, and 9,000 tons would be nine thousand times $220. That is, the loss will be in the neighborhood of $2,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No such figure was estimated by anyone.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the situation of affairs. They are to take over 9,000 tons of sugar for which Howell, Son & Co. paid 13 cents, and sell it at the market price.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We are all familiar with the case, and the question is whether Congress shall insist that these people be treated in this way.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

TRADE WITH CHINA.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 262, commonly known as the China trade act.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope I may be indulged while I make a brief statement with regard to the scope and the purpose of the bill. It is intended, Mr. President, to remove some of the disadvantages which are experienced by citizens of the United States in trading with the people of China. I will not attempt to state all of these disadvantages, but will content myself with a statement of one or two of the principal difficulties.

We all know that transactions of a material character in commerce are carried on largely through the medium of corporations. When the people of the United States desire to deal, in a corporate form, in foreign commerce with the people of China it is necessary that the corporation shall be organized under the laws of some State or Territory of the United States. There is no general incorporation law in China. There is very little coherence in the laws of China relating to commerce of a general character. Until recently it was possible for those who wanted to engage in commerce with that country to organize under what are known as the Hongkong ordinances. Not very long ago, however, that rule was changed so that none but British subjects could incorporate under these ordinances. So it came about that American corporations or American citizens who had theretofore done business in that way were compelled to abandon it and to rely entirely upon organizations under the corporate laws of some State or Territory of the United States.

Every principal country other than ours which does business in China is enabled to organize corporations under the laws of the country of which the people interested are citizens. It is not so in the United States. The people of China look with some suspicion upon a corporation organized under the law of a State, simply because it is quite beyond the comprehension of the ordinary Chinese business man to understand why an association which seeks to do business in China does not come with the authority of the United States rather than with the authority of some particular State.

There is a great deal of capital in China which the people of this country and of every other country, indeed, naturally desire to enlist in the commercial transactions which are daily carried on; but Americans who are trying to do business in China encounter difficulties which they can not surmount when they are compelled to compete with corporations which are organized under the laws of Great Britain or under the laws of some other well-known and well-understood Government. That is resulting in a diminution of our trade in China, and it is apprehended that, as time goes on, the disadvantage will be greater than it now is.

We have, as Senators are aware, what is known as an extraterritorial jurisdiction in China. China is one of two or three countries possibly in which the United States, under a treaty, exercised a certain jurisdiction over its citizens in China and with respect to many controversies which arise between citizens of the United States and citizens of China. That jurisdiction is exercised through a United States district court in China and through the consular officers established by our Government in that country. What I have said about the United States is also true of other countries which have extraterritorial jurisdiction for their courts in China.

I presume there is no country in the world in which there will be found as great opportunities for the enlargement and increase of our commerce as in China. That country is just beginning to manifest its full strength, and China, as a whole, wants a great many things which we produce, and the people of this country will want a great many of the things which China produces.

I take it for granted that there will be no dispute of the fundamental proposition that if we can do it without injury, without imposing any burden whatever upon the United States, we ought to do all we can to enable our citizens to compete upon favorable terms with the citizens of other countries in the commerce which is carried on between ourselves and China.

This subject grows in importance, because we all believe that the outcome of the Limitation of Armament Conference which is now in session in Washington—of which I see a distinguished member, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], acting for the United States, now in the Senate Chamber—will be a very considerable if not a complete emancipation of China from interference on the part of other nations of the world, and I have no doubt that China will, under these better conditions, do a great deal more business with the United States than it has ever before done.

Mr. President, I could amplify this subject indefinitely, for the hearings which we have undertaken in the Judiciary Committee, from which this bill is reported, are replete with illustrations and information indicating conclusively that we can make our trade with China more secure and make certain that it will grow and develop commensurately with our own growth and development; but I shall forbear unless some inquiry is made or some objection upon that score appears. The Judiciary Committee were very deeply impressed in a general way with the wisdom of making some suitable provision for the protection of our commerce and for the advantage of our own people.

I pass at once to the differences which exist between the bill passed by the House of Representatives and the bill as reported to the Senate. I have not referred to that up to this time, but I interpose the thought that the House of Representatives passed, I think, with substantial unanimity the bill which is now under consideration. It came to the Senate. A subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, of which I happened to be chairman, held hearings and heard the arguments.

The most important controversy before that subcommittee, and afterwards before the full committee, related to the form in which we should give the encouragement and protection that seemed to be so necessary. The House bill is bottomed upon a theory of our constitutional authority which the Senate committee was unable to accept. That is the principal reason for the very substantial changes which appear in the substitute which the Senate committee recommends as compared with the provisions of the House bill.

Passing a great many objectionable provisions which we found in the House bill, I invite the attention of Senators to the foundation or basis of the proposed legislation in that bill. The House bill provided for the organization of corporations just as our bill does. In section 4 the general purpose of these corporations is set forth. I beg to read that section. It is as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) Three or more individuals (hereinafter in this act referred to as the "incorporators"), a majority of whom are citizens of the United States, may, in accordance with the provisions of this act, form a corporation.

(b) Such corporation may engage in any business or enterprise conducted wholly within China and carried on with persons in China; except that the corporation—

(1) Shall not engage in any business or enterprise unlawful in the territory in which it is carried on; and

(2) Shall not engage in the business of discounting bills, notes, or other evidences of debt, of receiving deposits, of buying and selling bills of exchange, or of issuing bills, notes, or other evidences of debt, for circulation as money; nor engage in any form of banking business.

(c) The corporation shall not engage in any business or enterprise other than that authorized by subdivision (b), except that it—

(1) May purchase in the United States for transportation to China, goods, wares, or merchandise necessary to the establishment and conduct of a business or enterprise in which it is authorized to engage;

(2) May do in the United States and elsewhere any act which is incidental to the organization of the corporation or to the issue, sale, transfer, or redemption of its stocks, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness; and

(3) May do in the United States and elsewhere any act which is approved by the Secretary of Commerce as necessary to the establishment and conduct of any business or enterprise in which it is authorized to engage.

I think, Mr. President, that most lawyers will agree that it is not within the constitutional powers of Congress to authorize the formation of corporations for the purpose of carrying on a business wholly within a foreign country. At least that was the unanimous view of the members of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and also of the full committee when the bill was reported to that body. We heard arguments of some length and some merit upon that proposition, and I think none of the lawyers who appeared for the House bill really doubted the statement I have just made; but it was sought to found our power to authorize the formation of corporations to do business wholly in China upon the theory that we exercised extraterritorial jurisdiction in China and that under our treaties with that country we could authorize the organization of these corporations. Upon that point we heard the representatives of the Secretary of State and the representatives of the Department of Commerce, but we were not persuaded that we had any such authority; and after very careful consideration we dismissed any attempt to authorize the organization of corporations simply to do business in another country and wholly within another country.

It then became important for us to determine whether there was any practicable way in which we could authorize the organization of a national corporation to meet the demands which seemed to be very clear and very imperative. After much discussion and months of reflection and study the Senate committee came to the conclusion that Congress could very properly, and that it ought to, authorize the organization of corporations the business of which would be to engage in commerce between the people of the United States and the people of China.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator claim that there is any greater authority in the Federal Government to create corporations to engage in commerce between citizens of the United States and the nationals of a foreign country than there is to create corporations to engage in interstate commerce?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will permit me, I will answer that question not categorically but by stating what I understand to be the authority of Congress in that general respect.

In my opinion Congress has no greater power to create corporations to engage in foreign commerce than it has to create corporations to engage in commerce among the States. The Constitution gives us that authority in exactly the same terms. The provision of the Constitution—without attempting to quote it literally—is that Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations; so that I answer the question by saying that our power in the one respect is just the same as our power in the other respect. Before I attempt to present the outline of my argument upon that point, however, I ought to lay before the Senate what we have proposed in the substitute as reported by the committee.

This substitute is a general incorporation act, applicable only to China, but it does not create any specific corporation. It takes much of its language from the most advanced and the most modern of the State legislation upon that subject, and authorizes individuals to incorporate, and then surrounds the corporation with such restrictions and safeguards, both as to the public and as to those who may deal with it, as modern thought has seemed to require.

The amendment proposed by the Senate committee provides:

> Five or more individuals (hereafter in this act referred to as "incorporators"), a majority of whom are citizens of the United States, may, as hereinafter in this act provided, form a corporation for the purpose of engaging in commerce between the people of the United States and the people of China.

I need not go further in reading the substitute, so far as the point is concerned with which I am now dealing, because all the remainder of the substitute consists of provisions for the government and restriction and safeguarding of the corporation and the people who deal with it; but the question which is evidently in the mind of the Senator from Utah is whether Congress has the power to authorize the creation of a corporation to engage in commerce among the States or to engage in commerce between the United States and a foreign country.

I have no doubt whatever about that proposition. It was for years seriously disputed; but, if I understand correctly the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that uncertainty now has been put at rest. The Supreme Court has decided in at least four cases, as I remember—I have not examined them in recent months, nor do I carry in my mind the citations—that Congress may create a corporation to engage in the business of a common carrier among the States. The decisions to which I refer do not, it is true, found that power solely upon what we know as the commerce clause of the Constitution, because they invoke the war power and the power to establish post offices and post roads as well; but in each of them the clause which I have already mentioned—namely, the authority to regulate commerce among the States—is referred to as one of the constitutional grants of authority which would empower Congress to authorize the incorporation of railway carriers doing business among the States.

There is no difference in principle between authorizing the creation of a corporation carrier to transport goods from one State to another and authorizing an association to sell goods in one State to be delivered in another, or to buy goods in one State to be transported beyond its borders.

If we have that authority with regard to our internal commerce, there can be no question whatever that we have it with regard to our foreign commerce; and the members of the subcommittee, composed of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and myself, after reviewing the authorities, were fully convinced of our constitutional authority to do the thing which we have now proposed to the Senate to be done. I think no question was made of our constitutional authority when the bill was reported to the full committee and considered there, and reported, as I remember, unanimously. Until some one is able, through reference to some adjudication, to cast a doubt upon our power in that respect, I shall content myself with the references I have already made; for it seems to me that in view of the investigations which we have carried on in the past 10 years, especialy in the Committee on Interstate Commerce, it has become one of the accepted doctrines of the lawyers of this country that in our efforts to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations we can create such agencies to engage in that commerce as the necessities of the situation may require.

I recognize, of course, that after I have established the full constitutional authority to do what I have done, there still remains to be considered the policy or wisdom of accomplishing our purpose in this way.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Conceding the full power of the Federal Government to adopt regulatory measures over interstate commerce or over corporations engaged in interstate commerce or foreign commerce, does the Senator differentiate this bill, and the corporations which it will create, and the objects which it will accomplish, from mere regulatory provisions?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course I do not differentiate it, because to differentiate it would be to destroy my argument entirely.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator's theory is that the power to regulate includes the power to create corporations to engage in interstate commerce or commerce between the United States or its nationals and foreign States and the nationals of other countries?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I repeat that the Supreme Court of the United States has said that, as a matter of regulation of commerce among the States, it is within the province of Congress to create the agencies through which transportation can be and is carried on. The question with regard to our power to organize or create a corporation to sell and buy goods passing from one State to another has never arisen, simply because Congress up to this time has never attempted to exercise that particular kind of authority; but that it can be well founded upon our power to regulate commerce I have no doubt whatever.

Mr. KING. The Senator, who is a great lawyer, will perceive that his argument and his position, carried to the logical conclusion, mean that the Federal Government has the power—though it does not necessarily mean that it will be exercised—to take over practically all the commerce of the United States and to control it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not concede that.

Mr. KING. To regulate it, to create the instrumentalities by which that business shall be carried on, define the limitations and the power of corporations, prescribe the compensation of employees, provide an army of Federal officials to supervise and control and to regulate the activities of all of the interstate commerce, which is substantially, perhaps, 60 to 80 per cent of the commerce of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, some part of what the Senator from Utah has just said is very readily conceded, but I do not concede all of it. I have no doubt about the power of Congress to regulate the affairs of associations doing an interstate business; none whatever. We have done that repeatedly. A conspicuous illustration of the power we have exercised in that way is the antitrust law. Where do we get the power to say that a combination or an agreement or a conspiracy in restraint of trade shall be an offense, or that the thing itself may be abated? The antitrust law specially says "to restrain trade among the States or with foreign nations." Just how far we may go in the regulation of the association or corporation so engaged it is not necessary to answer, but we have not yet found the limit of our jurisdiction in that respect. The Interstate Commerce Commission is constantly exercising that jurisdiction in an extremely wide field. The Federal Trade Commission is exercising that power, wisely, I hope; beneficially, I hope; but, at any rate, no one questions its general power in that respect, and there are many other of our departments which are exercising a similar authority.

That leads inevitably to the conclusion that if Congress desires to do it, if it is found to be good policy to do it, we can authorize the formation of corporations to engage in commerce between the United States and foreign countries. There is no reason for doing that with respect to most of the world, and Congress, I assume, would as to most countries be exceedingly slow to exercise its undoubted authority; but there is a sound reason for doing it with respect to China, if we intend to take our part in the commerce of that great, undeveloped country, under the conditions I outlined a few moments ago.

The point, I think the only point, that is subject to dispute is the one I have just stated. I submit that if Senators will examine the remaining parts of this bill it will be found that these corporations are to be organized in a way and under such restraints as will make them as nearly honest and fair as individual or corporate action can be made. If there is failure in this substitute to put around these organizations all proper restrictions in order to hold them to the utmost accountability, both to their stockholders and creditors and to the public generally, upon suggestion of any such failure I will be very glad to take it up; but I do not think I ought to consume the time of the Senate in passing over critically and in detail these parts of the bill, because they are common to the incorporation laws in almost every State in the Union. They are just such provisions as are found in the laws of nearly every State in the United States. I desire to say before I close, so that there may be no controversy about that phase of the matter, that in the bill as it passed the House there was a provision for the exemption of these corporations from taxation. That did not commend itself to the Judiciary Committee, and no such provision will be found in the substitute proposed by our committee, and that idea is just as abhorrent to me now as it was when there were certain proposals looking to the amendment in that respect of the revenue bill recently passed. I say this because I want no misunderstanding with regard to that matter.

With these suggestions, Mr. President, I submit my analysis of the bill to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has been presenting a very important matter to the Senate. There have been three Republicans and half a dozen Democrats here. I am sorry more were not here to listen to his argument upon a matter which obviously is important to the commerce of the United States.

Obviously the consideration of this measure will take some further time; I desire to address myself to it to-morrow morning. I suggest the absence of a quorum, and when a quorum is obtained I hope we may hear the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who will not be able to be here to-morrow, who desires to submit some observations to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 15, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we have found Thee in the beneficence of earth and sky, in the stress of duty, in the exactions of labor, and even in the solitude of sorrow. We therefore approach the secret place of the Most High to render Thee our humble thanks and gratitude. We ask Thee to fill our lives with great and mighty meaning. Then shall we be able to mount the heights that are and move toward the greater heights beyond. May our love for our country be pure and sacrificial and may we always work to keep it right and just. Grant that our land may ever be a balm for the sick, a joy for the sorrowing, and a refuge for all who love our flag and respect our laws. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8928.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8928, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8928, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section, to follow the section just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 36, after line 17, insert a new section to read as follows:

"That, subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget, the rates of compensation of all employees in the District of Columbia, except those whose wages are adjusted by now existing wage boards, to whom compensation schedules are made inapplicable by section 3 hereof, shall be fixed and be readjusted from time to time by a board of three members, to be appointed by the President and to hold office during his pleasure. One member of such board shall be chosen from among the employees affected, one representative of the Government, and one representative of the public. The members of this board shall serve without compensation."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-one Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ansorge	Beedy	Brennan	Burtness
Anthony	Bland, Ind.	Brinson	Christopherson
Appleby	Blanton	Brooks, Ill.	Clark, Fla.

Hawley	Luhring	Rodenberg

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions in the District of Columbia and in the field services, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 309 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted a list of absentees for insertion in the RECORD and in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] is recognized.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday there was stricken from the bill section 8, which provided for a wage commission, and it was the intention of the committee reporting the bill, who incorporated section 8 in it, to have it apply solely to skilled labor and skilled trades within the District of Columbia. Considerable objection was raised to section 8, and it was stricken from the bill for these reasons: It is the present policy of the Government in fixing wages for machinists, metal workers, and others who are in the skilled trades and skilled labor by a system of wage boards. Throughout the country there are in the navy yards and arsenals local wage boards who from time to time fix and adjust the wages of the employees falling in that class, and who by law fix them at a figure in no case higher than the prevailing rates paid to similar labor in that vicinity. It was feared that the section as drawn would interfere with the operation of the present wage boards in the field services throughout the country. The section was also objected to on the ground that it would interfere with the existing system of adjusting wages in the navy yard here in the District of Columbia, which has such a wage board. There was also some objection raised that this wage commission might be a permanent body, building up an organization, with clerical force, and so forth.

Now, granting the validity of these objections, and seeking to eliminate them, and yet to provide a means of fixing the wages of some 10,000 skilled labor employees in the District of Columbia who are not in the navy yard, the chairman of the committee offers the pending amendment, which in the first place restricts its operation to the District of Columbia. That eliminates the entire field service, and in the second place it excepts those whose wages are now adjusted by existing wage boards. That eliminates the navy yard here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would like to get some idea about what number of employees now in the District of Columbia are not included in the jurisdiction of the existing wage board?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The existing establishments where no wage board now exists are the Government Printing Office and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and also a large number of scattered skilled employees in the various departments. They number about 10,000, and provision ought to be made for them in this bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further there?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why is it not possible to bring these employees in the District of Columbia that are not now included under the jurisdiction of the wage boards within the same kind of jurisdiction or under the same sort of wage boards as are now operating in the navy yards and arsenals throughout the country if any wage boards are necessary at all for these in the District?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I thank the gentleman for that question. He has tersely stated just exactly what the amendment intends to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not quite agree with the gentleman's statement there.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Let me read the provision to the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. These other boards, as I understand, are not constituted like the one provided for in this amendment, and their action is not subject to review and approval or disapproval by the Budget Bureau as provided in this amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The approval by the Bureau of the Budget is general, and applies to every estimate and to the details of every estimate, and this only preserves that same jurisdiction over this new wage board which exists at the present time over all the wage board, and all the departments that transmit the estimates based upon wage-board action.

Mr. BARKLEY. The power of the Bureau of the Budget is general in the revision of estimates; but, as I understand, the Bureau of the Budget has now no authority to pass upon decreases or increases of wages fixed by these wage boards.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It can effectively do so. If there is an estimate of so much money for so many thousand employees and they think the wage scale is too high, they can scale it down.

Mr. BARKLEY. In your amendment here you give the Bureau of the Budget practically the power to fix the wages by rejecting or disapproving any recommendation of this wage commission.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does not the gentleman think it is a salutary safeguard to supervise and review the action of the wage boards?

Mr. BARKLEY. Replying to the gentleman's inquiry, I am frank to say that I do not believe that it was ever intended by Congress that the Bureau of the Budget should have the power to pass upon the increase or decrease of the individual wages of the various employees of the Government. I think that the bureau was intended to coordinate the various branches and to have some system in the estimates submitted to Congress, but certainly that Bureau of the Budget ought not to have the power to say whether the wages in the Government Printing Office or in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing or anywhere else ought not to be increased when this commission, or whatever authority exists for that purpose, says they are entitled to an increase. I do not think that was intended in the scope of its duties.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not think any such action would follow from the amendment as drawn at all. It simply refers to the Bureau of the Budget the exercise of the power of revision in this respect as in every other respect; that is all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Now, if this board should hold that there are men in the Printing Office, for instance, who ought to be increased, could not the Budget Bureau nullify that decision by a contrary decision?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I presume the Budget Bureau would have that power. The President of the United States also has that power. But I doubt if the Bureau of the Budget or the President would exercise it or do anything of the sort.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I have had information that some of the workers in many particulars objected to the provision in section 8, but that the gentleman's amendment is satisfactory to all the workers.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I know of no objection from any source to this particular amendment as drawn. That is, no objection has been voiced to me, save as to its form.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman's amendment apply to all the employees in the District of Columbia, including the clerical forces?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no. It says:

That subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget the rates of compensation of all employees in the District of Columbia except those whose wages are adjusted by now existing wage boards to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable under section 3 hereof——

Mr. MANN. Then it does apply to the clerical force?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; it only applies to those in the District of Columbia to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable, and that means the skilled trades. The compensation schedules are applicable to the clerical forces; therefore they are not within the purview of this amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman's language is susceptible of the explanation he gives, but it is very inartificially drawn. The language that the gentleman excepts to is the language excepting from the general provision of the wage board. That is the way I read it, and I read it six times, trying to make out the proper construction of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This amendment is not much less vicious than section 8, which was stricken from the bill. Day before yesterday the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union took a vote on section 8, and by an almost unanimous vote—122 to 9—it was stricken from the bill. Now it is coming in by the back door; not the same thing in toto, but the same thing in effect, and just as bad in many of its essential provisions as was the original section.

This amendment does a lot of things that we do not want. It is now stated that it constitutes a board which shall pass upon the wages of certain skilled and semiskilled employees in the District of Columbia, and it is said it is limited to the employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and to the Government Printing Office and a few other unclassified workers, and does not include the navy yards and arsenals. I want you to notice the language of it—shall be fixed and readjusted from time to time by a board of three members to be appointed by the President, and to hold office during his pleasure.

That subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget, the rates of compensation of all employees in the District of Columbia, except those whose wages are adjusted by now existing wage boards, to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable—

Listen to this—

This means that the wages of about 10,000 employees in the District of Columbia shall be fixed by the wage board at their pleasure, and the members of the board shall be appointees of the President. There are no restrictions upon what rates of wages they shall give. You will remember that now the wages of the employees in the navy yards and arsenals of the United States are fixed by local wage boards. These local wage boards are established by law. They cost the Government nothing. They are composed under the orders of the commandant of the particular institution involved. The law, however, provides that the wage they fix shall be the wage that is customarily paid in that locality; and the last time the bill was up the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] incorporated an amendment on the existing law providing that these local boards in arsenals and navy yards should never pay more than was paid for similar work in that locality, and we adopted that by an overwhelming vote, thus limiting the operation of these boards to pay not more than what was being paid in that locality. Do you see any such limitation in this amendment? No; the wage board that the chairman of this committee [Mr. LEHLBACH] seeks to set up in this amendment can fix these wages at any figure they desire without any limitation. It may be more than is paid in this locality for similar work, and there is no limitation upon it at all.

I have contended all the time during this argument on this bill and on this section that this appointment of a Federal wage commission is a bad plan, anyhow. I do not believe that Congress ought to give away to any board its right to fix these statutory wages. [Applause.] What is the reason for it? Are we not competent to legislate on this subject? We are doing so now.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under this amendment, if it should be adopted, we would have this situation, that in the District of Columbia we would have some skilled laborers in the employment of the Government whose wages were fixed by the local board and others whose wages would be fixed by this board, subject to review by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. By a political board, if you please.

Mr. BARKLEY. There would be no uniformity between different classes of laborers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The men in the navy yard would be limited to what others in similar outside trades were getting, while the fellows in the Printing Office would not. Their wages would be fixed by a board appointed by the President. I do not care whether by a Republican President or a Democratic President. That makes no difference. The wages will be fixed by a board appointed by the President. It is said that one representative on the board shall be from the workers. Who appoints him? Do the workers appoint him? Not at all. The President appoints him. The President appoints all the members of the board, and these 10,000 employees come in and make their showing to the board, and the board do just as they please, and Congress appropriates the amount they tell us to appropriate. Gentlemen of the committee, we have ability enough in this House to fix these wages ourselves, and we ought to do it. The gentleman says we are leaving these 10,000 men out of consideration. Why does he not fix his bill and put them in and take care of them, instead of deputizing to some political board the task of doing the thing that we ought to do?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman says the task of fixing wages should not be deputized, but should be done by Congress. Did not the gentleman yesterday state that the wage board fixed the wages in the arsenal in his home district, and did he not give that system his approval?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I said that had been the established law for many years in that institution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The wisdom of that course was ascertained long before I came into this body and has been handed down from year to year. But if the argument of the gentleman is right, if I made any such concession I would like to have the gentleman show me any such safety provisions in this amendment as surround the men in those public institutions. There are no safety provisions here. It is wide open and the roof is the limit. That is one bad feature in it, but there is a worse one. The amendment seeks to impose on the Bureau of the Budget functions never intended that that budget should perform. The Bureau of the Budget was constituted originally to reckon up the expenditures of the Government and, as I said on a former occasion, give the President advice whether we could cut our suit to fit our cloth. By this amendment you give over the right to a board to fix the wages and to have it revised by the Bureau of the Budget. I will tell you gentlemen that if you pass this amendment you will have to make these appropriations for this class of employees in a lump sum. How else can you do it? Do you think that is a good way to appropriate money, to appropriate a lump sum? We must do it that way, because the wage board may meet at any time and change the standard. We ought to keep our hand on the throttle; we ought to know what we are paying. These men ought to have a statutory wage, and we ought to appropriate for statutory wages as we are doing now. Whatever else may be said about other parts of the bill, this amendment is vicious and ought to be defeated.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would like to ask the gentleman if the salaries of the employees of the Printing Office and in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are not fixed by statute?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely.

Mr. CLOUSE. Under this amendment it would give the wage board the power to fix the salaries or wages of these employees at any sum they saw fit.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; and all the previous legislation we have had on that subject will be at an end.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 205. An act relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment now proposed is just one more link in the confusion of this bill. I would like to know how many men in this body are satisfied in their own minds that they ought to vote for this bill. I would like to know how many men in this body feel in their own minds that they can vote intelligently for this bill. Some one has asked what is to become of the clerical force of the Members of this body under this bill. There is no provision in the bill for them. They are not under the civil service, and if any provision is to be made hereafter to take care of them it will have to be by an independent bill introduced in the House. How many of you gentlemen knew that? They are not included.

Now, gentlemen, I wish for the last time, because it is the last opportunity I shall have, to call to your attention some of the things this bill will do. It will do more to destroy the civil service than anything that has been introduced in Congress since I have been here. It will do more to ruin the budget system than anything that has been suggested, and that entire organization is crying out against this thing being imposed upon it. Why men should insist in trying to destroy an instrument that we are looking to for so much good is hard for me to understand. If you pass the bill as now proposed and it becomes a law, it will entail an additional expense of $19,000,000 a year at least on the taxpayers of the United States. Are you willing to do it? It has been admitted time and time again that these schedules are based upon the high cost of living that was extant at the time of the reclassification made by the committee. A confession of that fact was made in the proposal to reduce the schedule or the amounts called for 10 per cent. It is admitted that the price of living is still high, above normal, some say 75 per cent, and the gentleman from New York contends it is more than 75 per cent above normal. Here you are fixing schedules of salaries at 75 per cent higher than the normal rate. higher than you would do if you were fixing it at a normal rate. Are we abnormal as the times are abnormal? We will be if we give our sanction to this abnormal system of salary fixing and these grades of salaries. This is not the time to do it. We have got along in the last two or three years under trying circumstances by patchwork, and we had better patch it up a little longer until we can more intelligently arrive at some arrangement whereby gentlemen with a clear conscience can vote for a reclassification. There are not 15 men within the sound of my voice who will be satisfied in their own minds if this bill passes at these abnormal figures. I say as a representative of the people we have no right to accept such figures. The people have no representatives except us; they have no one sitting in the gallery asking us not to pass something that they know is not right.

I appeal to you in the name of the taxpayers of this country, who in the last analysis are the ones who must pay the bills. There is no one here but will admit that if these salary lists are passed and become a law as they are now there is a possibility of raising from the minimum to the maximum. You gentlemen who have had experience know how easy it is to boost a salary from the lower to the higher, and how hard it is to reduce it from the higher to the lower, so that in any event you may rest assured that you are making it possible to entail an expense of more than $19,000,000 in addition to the present salary lists, and you are also fixing forever the bonus as a part of the permanent salary of these Government employees. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words in reply to the contention of the gentleman from Indiana that the salary schedules in this bill are abnormal. I submit that he has offered no proof of that assertion. I always think that an ounce of fact is worth a pound of theory or a flood of vehement denunciation of a proposition without citing facts. I have here in my hand the announcement digest from the United States Civil Service Commission announcing examinations for certain positions in the Government service, which came to my office, and I suppose to the office of every Member of Congress, yesterday. It is dated December 10, 1921. I am going to read from it and by comparison with the pending bill show the House just what salaries are now paid for some of these particular positions, and what will be paid if this bill becomes a law. If any gentleman who is opposing this bill takes the position that I am inaccurate in any of these statements I shall gladly yield for correction.

First, here is an advertisement for chemists in the Chemical Warfare Service, the salary scale of which ranges from $3,600 to $5,000 a year under the present law; associate chemist, $2,500 to $3,600 a year; assistant chemist, $1,800 to $2,500 a year. Let us see where these particular positions would fall under our bill. They would fall in the professional service. Let us take, first, the assistant chemists. At the present time they would receive under this advertisement of the Civil Service Commission in the minimum grade, $1,800 plus $240 after six months in the service, which makes it $2,040, and the maximum grade would run as high as $2,500, plus the $240 after six months in the service, which would make it $2,740. Therefore, under the present law for assistant chemists it may be said the compensation ranges are from $2,040 to $2,740 for this particular grade of the service.

What would be the salary ranges under this bill?

Grade 2, which provides the assistant professional grade, which would take in the grade of employees to which I have just referred, runs from $2,100 to $2,640. Therefore the entrance grade in this bill is $60 more than that announced by the Civil Service Commission in this announcement digest, and $100 less than the maximum grade.

Let us take next the associate chemists. Under this advertisement under the present law the associate chemist receives $2,500 plus the $240, which is $2,740. That is the minimum grade, and the maximum is $3,600. Under our bill this class of Government employees would fall in grade 3, associate professional grade, which begins at $2,820 and runs to a maximum, as amended, of $3,540. So that we have a $60 increase in the minimum grade published in the civil-service announcement digest and a $60 reduction in the maximum grade.

Let us take next the chemist, the full professional grade. Under the advertisement of the Civil Service Commission which I have just read the chemist receives from $3,600 to $5,000 per year. Under our bill, grade 4, which is the full professional grade, the pay runs from $3,720 to $4,620, so that in the minimum grade of the full professional grade under the Lehlbach bill there would be an increase of $120 and a reduction of $380 in the maximum grade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question on that point?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman explain why it is that all of the Government employees are so favorable to this bill and want it so badly, if they are going to have a cut in salary? That is a rather unnatural condition and I would like to have that explained.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will permit, I have never contended that all of the salary schedules would work out just as the comparison I am now making. I am citing these examples to disprove the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that this is a wildly extravagant bill. I have stated that there are many cases under the old statutory salaries where the employees are underpaid as compared with others doing similar work in the Government service, and it is expected that this bill will even up these discrepancies and make them more uniform and equitable, without adding any new burdens to the Treasury.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Not now, I am sorry but I have only about a minute more. Let me go on with this comparison. There is an advertisement here in this digest for a drug inspector, Bureau of Chemistry, at $1,600. The drug inspector under the present law receives $1,600 plus the $240 after six months, which is $1,840. Under this bill we are now considering this particular employee would fall in grade 3 of the inspectional service and the salary range of that grade is $1,800 to $2,040. There will be an increase of $120 over the present entrance grade, not including the $240 which is now paid after six months' service, but it would be $40 less than the entrance grade if the $240 is included. The maximum grade in our bill would be $200 per annum above the present entrance grade, including the $240 increase after six months. But it must not be understood that the employee would receive this maximum salary when he first comes into the service. Not at all. He would only be eligible to that salary by promotion, because of faithful and efficient service.

I merely cite these examples as instances to show how the bill will work out in practice and to refute the argument that it imposes upon the Government an extravagant scale of salaries.

My view of this whole matter is to steadfastly oppose the creation of any new Government bureaus which we do not need, and if we have any now that we should not have or which should be consolidated with others, let us take that action. No one will join in it more heartily than I. But for those Government employees who are needed in the service, let us prepare a range of salaries which will be fair to them for the work performed and fair to the public.

It is because I believe this bill to a measurable degree comes up to that standard that I am supporting it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to call the attention of the committee, and especially of my friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK], to a proposition which we are now considering in the Appropriations Committee, to which he has repeatedly referred during this debate. We are now considering the Post Office appropriation bill. My fingers have been burned already with reorganization economists. There is no such animal. Every reorganization bill that I have ever seen has been one which raises salaries and is full of extravagance. The people and taxpayers never get any consideration. The bill is introduced either by them, for them, or by anyone who is sound for them, but always for the employee. We are considering a bill now in our committee which deals with a bill which reorganized the Postal Service, and I do not believe the membership of this House would have voted for it if they could have known what it would cost us in one year. That postal reorganization bill, in the interest of economy, with the identical clerical force in the field and in the city of Washington, has cost us $42,000,000. It will cost, to be exact, this year $41,855,000, and if you add to that the war bonus act of July 2, 1918, which increased the pay to postal employees $33,202,600, then add to that the increase under House joint resolution of November 8, 1919, which is $35,898,400, you have a grand total of $212,859,600. Some economy, I would say. Legislation affecting the postal employees in reference to their classification, including the soldiers' preference act, has already cost us $110,756,000. and the automatic promotions under that Post Office reorganization act to which the gentleman from Texas has so repeatedly referred as justification for this bill, according to the testimony of those gentlemen before us at this time, will in the next year, including the other bonuses, be something like $212,859,000, to which must be added the automatic increases under that bill, which will be at least $40,000,000, with the identical service that you have now. The Lord only knows where it will finally get to.

Gentlemen of the House, I beg and beseech you to remember the people you represent. They are the taxpayers. Both parties, especially you Republicans, are committed and are honor bound to reduce taxes, and you can not reduce taxes unless you reduce expenses. You will violate every obligation that you owe your people to pass this bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, I fear that I am appealing to deaf ears. The "die is cast," the edict has gone forth, the command is given, and you will place hand upon shoulder and lockstep will proceed, and the bill will pass. You will go back to your people and tell them how you voted for their interest. You know that they will not be able to find you out, so you surrender to these people closest to you now, those who draw the salaries. I know that it is unpopular here to vote as I am going to vote, but every one of you know that it is right to vote against this bill.

Why, I have heard men in the name of economy get down in this pit and say, "We are passing this bill in the name of economy, and because it will reduce expenditures so much." I have heard that for 14 years. Nearly every day I hear it said, and, my God, if this were true, and each of these bills have been reducing and promoting economy, as you hear of down in this pit, I will "be blamed" if we would not be running this Government now on a shoestring. [Applause.] And yet every time you get one of these reorganization bills and put it through, it is only necessary to wait until it has gone into operation and you find the practical effect of it to be that it mulcts the Government out of millions of dollars. I tell you the Post Office appropriation is not a bagatelle to what this will be in the next two or three years. Do not talk to me about a bill having the unanimous support of all the Government employees who are affected under the bill being for economy. I only want such evidence to prove the paternity of the child, to prove the father of this bill. I make proffer of this as evidence conclusive that there is no economy in the bill. No; not a salary is in fact reduced. They are all increased. These people down under the hill know what they are doing. The chief clerks and those people have figured these things out to a gnat's heel. They know what they are doing, but we Members of Congress do not know what we are doing. No; but you look, we vote for this bill as if we did. Do not say after you have been so repeatedly told of how wicked this bill is that you were mistaken. No; you had better leave it until the reforms which your administration (the Republican) is endeavoring to put into effect down there now under the direction of the President, under the direction of the Cabinet officers; you had better not meddle with them until you find out what these men are doing who, the people, when they elected Mr. Harding, authorized him to put in charge of this budget department—wait until you hear from them. You know this committee did not write this bill. This bill was not prepared by people who did not know what they wanted. This bill was prepared by people who did know what they wanted. Not a single member of this committee, not a Member of Congress can take this bill and come within $20,000,000 of what it is going to cost you finally. [Applause.]

It can not be done. You take it and figure it out. You have got to know first the number of employees in every grade. You have to go and get every chief clerk in this Government to make a list of the Government employees and the present salary plus the bonus, and then you would have to apply that pay roll to the rules laid down by this bill. Not a member of this committee can do it. It is a problem which every one of these chief clerks would have to work out after the bill is passed. And, mark you, every employee of the Government, I grant you, has looked it over and figured out how it is going to affect him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I would ask for two more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. In view of the fact we do not hear one single protest against it is the highest evidence of the fact it does not injuriously affect them, because if it affected a man in my district I would hear from him, and in your district you would hear from him. No; not one protest. This committee seems to have fallen under the control of the employees. Instead of Congress being made of men high-minded, men who their duties know and dare maintain, it seems to be made of men who fail completely, fail in courage, and bow submissively to the imperious will of the Government clerk.

You cut the salary of a man in your district and you will find out very quickly you will hear from him. You gentlemen are business men. You gentlemen on this side have an overwhelming majority; the responsibility is with you, and I believe my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations, and my colleagues who have served with me in this House for some time, will tell you that I have never played any politics with Uncle Sam's money. I do not believe in it. I think we ought to try to serve the people irrespective of what party we belong to, and I have tried to do it, and when I come to this majority I come to you in that spirit in regard to these matters, and I say to you without hesitation I do not believe a single member of this committee can tell you anything like what this will cost any more than they could tell you when they passed the reorganization bill for the Post Office Department. We did not dream the first year it would cost one hundred and ten and odd million dollars, but it has done it. It cost $110,000,000 without adding one single employee to the Postal Service; the stupendous sum of $110,000,000! Now, if you want to vote for this bill, if you want to vote for it without knowing exactly where you are going to land, go do it, for every man controls his own vote, influenced by his own conscience and by his own judgment. I appreciate, gentlemen, that you have the majority of this House, and I say you ought to wait until the Cabinet officers selected by your President have a chance to speak on the matter and put your budget into perfect system and effect. Vote this bill down and rely on those gentlemen, whom the country have selected down there to attend to your reorganization, and I believe you would be doing the right thing. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, I stated yesterday that this bill, predicated upon the idea that every person receiving the bonus was to have it continued, would cost the Government from thirty-five to forty million dollars. Over and above that it will cost the Government millions and millions more, because, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated yesterday, there is no question but what these men will ultimately be promoted to the highest grade.

The estimate as furnished to the committee is based on the medium grade. The medium grade, in some instances, is $500 less than in the maximum grade. But take the average of $200 as the increase between the minimum grade and the maximum grade and with the 63,630 employees in the District, that would incur an added obligation to the $40,000,000 the bonus occasions of $12,000,000.

Now, I wish to apply the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. I do not go to some advertisements of the Civil Service Commission to state to you the actual facts as regards the effect of this bill. I take the existing legislative bill, which you may all send for. On page 55 you will find there stated the salaries paid to the professional class he referred to under the Bureau of Standards. I am willing to take any one of them at the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas. Take the position of chemist. They pay a few chemists there the higher salary of $3,500. Under the Lehlbach proposition their salaries will be $3,720 to a maximum of $4,620. There are more chemists employed at $3,000. They will receive the same increase, a minimum of $3,720 to a maximum of $4,620.

Now, take the case of physicists. A leading physicist receives $3,600, and his salary will be increased from $3,720 to $4,620. But there are many physicists receiving $2,300 to $3,000.

I have here a table of the total estimate of these respective grades under the revised schedule proposed by the Lehlbach amendment. What do we find will be the increase in grades 3 and 4 of the professional class? The table is based upon compensation at the median rate, not the maximum rate. In grade 3 of the professional class it is estimated to be an increase of $711,098, or 17.4 per cent. The increase in grade 4 is $811,000, or 31 per cent.

Mr. BLACK. Were not those estimates made from the bill before amendments were adopted?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Here is what we find here. You will find on page 174 of the RECORD——

Mr. BLACK. When were those estimates made?

Mr. STAFFORD. They were based on the revised estimates. The figures under the original proposals can be found at the bottom of page 172.

Mr. BLACK. That is different.

Mr. STAFFORD. I call the attention of the committee to the table on page 172, as inserted by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], the author of the bill, based on the salaries before there was any revision of the schedules, and if I am in error, I wish to stand corrected. At the bottom of page 228 we find the estimates in the professional service: Grade 3, based upon the minimum rate of the salaries before they were revised, a total of $1,163,000, or a gross per cent of increase of 28.5; grade 4, $1,157,000, or a total percentage of increase of 44.2.

Now, turn over to page 174, and I ask the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the figures I have just read, which are lower in those same grades.

Under the revised schedules there will be large increases even taking the middle grade as the basis. So it is fair to state that this bill will add millions of taxes to the burdens of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. FAIRFIELD and Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] is recognized.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, men who are opposing this bill in their discussion assume that in the allocation the head of every department will do his best to secure the maximum salary for the individual who is allocated, and of all the employees. How improbable such an assumption is will address itself to your own good judgment.

In the second place, the assumption is that in the promotions the head of every department will seek every opportunity to put each individual into the maximum salary of the grade to which he belongs. The next assumption is that in the allocation, when the judgment of the Bureau of Efficiency is asked for, when the Civil Service Commission is consulted, that they, too, will sustain the heads of the departments in allocations that are just as burdensome on the Government as it is possible to secure. And beyond that, when the head of every department has prostituted his office and has stultified his conscience, and has violated the law against his oath to take care of the interests of the Government, and after the head of every department has thus acted and has been confirmed in it by the Civil Service Commission and by the Bureau of Efficiency, then the Committee on the Budget, to whom we look for a conservation of the resources of the country, will come in and say amen to this iniquitous proceeding.

Ah, it does seem strange to me that men would presume to say to intelligent men that that is a course which the application of this law will run. The truth is that this law is the result of many years of study and thought. The truth is that the conditions in the Government were so bad that Congress appointed a commission and spent a large sum of money to get accurate knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. That committee sat for more than a year, secured expert advice, and found out the exact condition and the personal service of every employee of the Government. Upon their report this bill was made.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Did your committee get reports from the different departments as to the application of this bill and its cost?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. From the various departments?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. We had an estimate as of date 1919.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. That has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. There was no estimate made except that proportional rates were applied as to the number in each department, and they were scaled down. There was no reliable information later than of 1919 as to the number of employees exactly and the wages that they were receiving. The estimates in this bill are based upon tentative allocations that were made by the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. But these estimates have not been brought down to date now? There are no comparable figures with present conditions?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will say to the gentleman from New York that in April, 1919, there were 90,413 employees. Those employees were card catalogued, and their pay, and duties, and so forth, and a tentative allocation under this bill was made. Using this same personnel, a comparison was made between the revised schedules and the then pay, and it was shown that substantially there would be no increase at the beginning of the installation of this reclassification, and the ultimate increase, if the conditions remained the same, would be about 1½ per cent; but since then the number of employees has been reduced from 90,413 to 69,000, a reduction of 21,000, and the annual salary has apparently risen from $1,472 to $1,593, which, of course, would lessen the gap between the reclassification and the conditions existing in 1919. Consequently there will be no increase in the cost of the civil service under this reclassification. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to propose the striking out of the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, one little feature about the pending amendment strikes me very forcibly, but I shall not object to it. It provides for the appointment of one member of the board of wages from the employees, one from the Government, and one from the public, and that they are to receive no compensation. Of course, the employee under the Government will continue to draw his pay, and the Government official will continue to draw his pay, but the man representing the interest of the public works for nothing, and hence he does not work. [Laughter.] It is ridiculous to expect somebody who knows to come to Washington and sit with a board frequently and constantly without any compensation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will get me more time I will.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is, however, the way that the wage boards in the navy yards and arsenals are constituted.

Mr. MANN. I expect so, and that is probably the reason why they very generally very much increase the wages. [Laughter.] The public has no look-in. I believe in giving the public a fair show. However, probably that is not serious.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a Member of this House for a long time in one way, and have paid a great deal of attention during a good many years to the appropriation bills. I presume I have stricken out more increases in pay, more additions of various sorts from appropriation bills than any other man who has ever been in Congress, living or dead. [Applause.] I have watched these appropriation bills, not in the last few years so carefully, but before that, for years. An appropriation bill that would come in from any of the subcommittees or any of the committees of the House, especially from the committee having in charge the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation, would be reported in the past, in the main, just the same as the existing law relating to the then current fiscal year, with a few additions, some added clerks. No Committee on Appropriations ever had the power, perhaps, certainly never exercised it, to attempt any correlation of the forces in different departments of the Government. They had not time; they had not the knowledge; and, as a rule, they could not extract the necessary knowledge from the department officials if those department officials knew.

There was a general demand from all members of the Committee on Appropriations, from all Members of the House, and I might say of the Senate, and from the executive departments of the Government, and from the public who had any knowledge, and frequently where they had no knowledge, that there should be a readjustment of offices or places under Government control, and that one department of the Government should not be permitted to employ a man under one title and pay him a salary for doing exactly the same work that another department employed a man under a different title and at a very considerably different salary. It looked as a business proposition as though the Government, with a good many branches, ought to have some method of bringing these branches into something like uniformity.

No great business concern would or could have continued to operate well under the conditions under which we were carrying on the Government. The great United States Steel Corporation, which has so many subsidiary companies, wholly independent of each other, can not provide and does not for a moment think of having an entirely new method and set of wages and titles in one mill from what it has in another mill. There is some correspondence, so that you may know something about the situation of all when you know about one place. But you can study one department of the Government to-day thoroughly, and yet have no idea, with the facts before you as to names and salaries, as to the condition in another department without studying that department.

We provided for a classification committee. I was not enamored of the idea. I was afraid of the classification committee and what it would do, before it was appointed, when it was appointed, and after it completed its work. But here is a bill largely based upon the work of the classification committee, and I have been surprised at the modesty of this bill. I expected, when they reported, following their study of this subject, that there would be an insistent demand for a great increase in the expense of the Government and the compensation of its employees, and I do not find that this is the case in this bill. [Applause.]

I have listened attentively and carefully, since I have been back, to the distinguished members of the Committee on Appropriations who have been fighting this bill.

I have always liked the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations that fights every expenditure which is not reported from that committee. I believe it is the duty of that committee to bring the matter before the House, and if they have not favored a proposition, to oppose it, so that we may have a chance to find out about it.

Now, I have listened to these distinguished members of the Committee on Appropriations in opposition to this bill with great respect, but I have not found yet that they have given any evidence against passing this bill. It may be—I do not know—that in the future under the terms of this bill there will be promotions under regulations for efficiency. It may be that under the regulations for efficiency employees will become more efficient and will have their salaries increased. I do not know; but I am sure that there ought to be a general regulation of this subject in all the departments of the Government, and I do not believe that the passage of this bill will at least immediately increase the expenses of the Government. I believe it will be a mighty good thing. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Senate concurrent resolution 16.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the two Houses complete the business of the calendar day of Thursday, December 22, 1921, they shall stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian Tuesday, January 3, 1922.

CLASSIFICATION OF CIVILIAN POSITIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I had not intended to say anything on this bill until I happened this morning to hear a gentleman speak very unjustly of the work of the Reclassification Commission; and inasmuch as I was a member of that commission I beg the indulgence of this committee while I say a word respecting that body, the work it did, and the report it submitted of its findings and recommendations. And by way of preliminary it may be well to say that my appointment came to me as a complete surprise. Not a word had ever been said or written to me upon the subject by any person until the distinguished Speaker, Mr. Clark, sent for me to come to the south corridor, and when I reached him asked if I would go upon the Reclassification Commission. I said, "Well, what commission is it? I am getting ready to go home. I am not to be a Member of the next Congress and have made all my preparations to leave for home in a few days." The Speaker replied, "A commission to reclassify the civilian employees of the Government in the District is provided for in a provision incorporated in an appropriation bill which has just passed, and I want you to be one of its members"; and I accepted the appointment. On the commission were three Senators, and two Members of the House whose terms were about to expire—Mr. Keating, of Colorado, and Mr. Hamlin, of Missouri.

The chairman was the Senator from New Mexico, Mr. JONES, an able man who had had long experience in an important position in the Department of the Interior. We called in experts of national reputation—Dr. Baird, of the New York Bureau of Municipal Research; Mr. Robert Moses, the executive secretary of the New York Reconstruction Commission, a man of wide experience in classification work; and E. O. Griffenhagen, an expert in accounting and reclassification, and the most remarkable man in his line of work that I have ever seen. Mr. Griffenhagen and members of his firm, at the request of a Canadian commission, had reclassified the Canadian civil service. His report was adopted by the Canadian Parliament by virtually a unanimous vote, and a bill embodying his recommendations was by that Parliament enacted into law and is now on the statute books of Canada. We employed Griffenhagen as our chief adviser during all our labors.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the pending bill in important particulars embodies the recommendations of the Reclassification Commission, of which I had the honor to be a member. We worked many hours, sometimes until midnight, and it may surprise you to know, but it is true, that we worked also on holidays in order to be able to complete our task and submit a final report within the very limited time allowed us by the statute. We were given virtually only 10 months; and after my appointment man after man came to me and said, "COOPER, this will take three or four years. Nobody expects you to get through within the time fixed." It was absolutely impossible to finish within the time limit, and we were compelled to ask for a few weeks more; but we finished the work in one year, and here is the report in this volume. The task assigned to the commission by Congress was the largest and most important of the kind ever undertaken. And, gentlemen, ignoring everything that I did, assuming that I did nothing at all, I do only justice to my fellow members when I say that the work of the commission as embodied in this report has been rightly declared by recognized leaders of opinion upon the subject of reclassification and the laws which ought to govern the civilian employees of this Government to be the best thing of the kind, the most exhaustive and thorough, in the history of the country.

We examined a very large number—many scores—of witnesses. We were astonished at the mental caliber of many of the employees of this Government. Some of them are men and women of unusual attainments, and it is a thousand pities that their testimony has not been printed. It would have illuminated the dark recesses of the minds of many gentlemen who in this debate have shown themselves to be so hostile to the pending measure. They would have been surprised to see and listen to the men and the women who came before us, some of them getting $1,800 a year, some $1,400, some $800, and supporting themselves and their children on those wages in Washington, the Capital of incomparably the richest Nation on which the sun ever shone, and a city that is the most expensive in the Nation in which to live.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We examined witnesses from almost every vocation in which humanity engages. There were 1,700 different classes of work, ranging from the humblest to the loftiest types, done by these employees. And the reclassification covered them all. It was a reclassification of charwomen, and of men who study the stars.

As has been said during the debate, this is one of the most important bills that will come before Congress; but not in the evil sense in which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] said it is important, not because it points toward an extravagant expenditure of the public funds, not at all; but important in its prophecy of a reformation of abuses that have gone on while my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], and other equally good friends on the Committee on Appropriations who oppose this bill, have been recommending appropriations year after year to support the very abuses which we made public in this report. Here are some, a very few, of the many indisputable statements of fact in our report:

Equal pay for equal work as a standard for employment does not prevail in the United States civil service. To secure the application of such a standard some centralized agency would have to be functioning to say what the wage should be and to see that that wage and no other is being paid. The Government has had no such agency.

Listen to this:

The commission found that of the 383 under file clerks, 92 received less than $720, whereas 77 received $1,000 or more. The most common rate was from $900 to $1,000. The difference between the highest paid and the lowest paid exceeded $500. It should not have exceeded $200.

We reported that—the figures for junior file clerks showed 309 at $900 but under $1,000, and 377 at $1,320 to $1,440—for doing identically the same work.

The absence of a proper relationship between the pay for the different classes would be apparent at a glance. Although one can generally pick out the dominating rate of pay for a class and likewise trace the general increase from class to class, the lack of a uniformly applied standard is at once apparent. Many junior file and record clerks are paid more than seniors, and some seniors get more than many principals.

We found, for example, that there were 106 different pay-roll titles in use for employees whose actual duties would bring them all under the title, "Senior file and record clerk." They were doing practically the same work and yet receiving all manner of wages.

Here is also what we found—and it is a significant fact:

Because of the practice of basing rates of compensation upon title of position only, it is not an uncommon occurrence to change the title of a position without change of duties so as to increase the salary of the incumbent.

Titles deliberately invented in order to increase salaries.

None of the members of the Committee on Appropriations who have during the debate opposed this bill, although they kept recommending appropriations, have ever introduced a measure or made a suggestion to remedy these acknowledged evils.

Now, to answer the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who a few moments ago declared that we ought to wait and not pass a reclassification bill until after the reorganization commission, recently appointed by President Harding, shall have issued its report, it is only necessary to say that the reorganization commission will have nothing whatever to do with reclassification.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the bill under consideration in any measure carry into practical effect recommendations made by the commission of which the gentleman was a member?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. Some of the most important of them. I shall vote for the bill, although I am opposed to the pending amendment. I think the bill, when enacted, will do a very great amount of good in remedying abuses.

Now, as I remarked, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] said that we ought to wait until the report of the reorganization committee recently appointed by President Harding. That commission is presided over by Mr. Brown, of Toledo, Ohio, who is, I understand, an excellent man, and is doing a laborious work, but it will not report a plan to reclassify positions but only a plan to reorganize departments and bureaus—two very different things.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin misunderstood the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]; he referred to the work of the Cabinet in making an efficiency survey and not to the reorganization commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I made a note of his words, and I am sure that everyone in the House understood that he meant the reorganization commission. And I wish again to direct attention to the fact that the reorganization commission will report simply as to where whole bureaus shall be allocated, in what form departments shall continue to exist, and, of course, whether there shall be an elimination or combination of existing bureaus and departments. But the question of reclassification is an entirely separate thing.

The friends of this bill want the employee who goes into the service of the United States in the District of Columbia to know what his or her duties are to be, and we want the law so made that nobody called upon to render certain service shall receive $1,000 more than another receives for performing the same work.

Here is what the commission unanimously found as to the probable expense if the bill should become law. The report was made on the 12th of March, 1920:

> Your commission recommends that the Congress authorize some competent body to make an examination of the work of the various departments with a view to their reorganization, to the end that duplication of activities may be eliminated and that modern methods may be generally introduced. In the judgment of your commission, such a reorganization would lead to a marked improvement in the service, and to a very considerable reduction in the annual expenditure.

The commission unanimously believed that reorganization would lessen annual expenditures. Already the discharge of employees in this District to the number of 20,000 and more will result in a reduction of annual expenditures of more than $20,000,000. And the coming reorganization will eliminate duplication of activities and result in a further reduction in annual expenditures.

Gentlemen of the committee, this is truly one of the most important bills that you will be called upon to consider, but it is important not in the bad sense of indicating extravagance or a wish to be extravagant, but in the noble sense of a desire to improve the civil service of the Government in the District of Columbia. What is the civil service here—this army of employees in the District? It is in an important sense the Government of the United States of America. This bill recognizes that fact. Its friends wish that the evils which beset the service here shall cease, and that employees shall be properly, not extravagantly, paid. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY rose.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would not take the time of the committee now to talk at all except for the fact that the debate has gone very far afield from the amendment which is pending and upon which we must vote in a few minutes. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] provides that there shall be set up by the President's appointment a wage board to pass upon the readjustment of wages from time to time of employees here in the District of Columbia not included in the provisions of section 3 of the bill. In other words, it is the same proposition that was included in section 8, which was stricken out day before yesterday by an overwhelming vote, except that it is limited to the employees in the District of Columbia who are either not classified under the schedules of salaries fixed in the bill or who already have a wage board to pass on the adjustment of their wages.

The objection that I have to this amendment in the first place is that it is unnecessary, and it is unwise in two or three respects. It applies only to the Printing Office and to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and perhaps to a few other unclassified employees in the various departments. If there is need of a wage board to pass upon the readjustment of wages in the Government Printing Office it ought to be the same kind of wage board that is provided by the law for the employees in the arsenals and in the navy yards, and if you adopt this amendment you will have this situation in the District of Columbia. In the navy yard they have a wage board that fixes and adjusts the wages. That wage board is arranged for on the premises. The laborers have a right to select one member of the board and the commandant selects another. They get together and adjust the wages of the employees of the navy yard, based on the current wages for similar employment in the community, and that will be here in Washington; and in other sections of the country where the arsenals and navy yards are located, based on the current wages at these places. You would have then two wage boards in the District of Columbia; one of them arranged for by employees and others of the Navy Department, to pass upon the wages of employees in the Navy Yard, and another set up by the appointment of the President to pass upon the wages of the employees of the Government Printing Office and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and any other unclassified employees there may be in the various departments.

The wages of these employees are already fixed by law. If there is anxiety here about the employees of these two departments, or they are not satisfied with present arrangements, then we ought to take them in under the general law, which gives them a right to have a wage board of their own, in which they have some voice, at least in the selection of one of the members of the board.

A more serious objection, at least one that is equally serious, to my mind, is the fact that this amendment gives the Bureau of the Budget power over the wages of the Printing Office employees and those of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which power they do not have over any other class of employees in the Government service. The Bureau of the Budget has no right to revise or disapprove the action of the wage board that passes on the wages of the employees in the Navy Yard or the arsenals, but you are in this amendment giving the Bureau of the Budget the right to veto the finding of the board set up by the appointment of the President, provided that bureau does not see fit to indorse the action of the wage board as to the employees covered by the amendment. I think it is an unwise provision in the first place. We never contemplated when we created the Bureau of the Budget that it was to be a wage-fixing board. Its business is to bring into the Congress an intelligent estimate which would enable us to pass intelligently upon the appropriation bills. We can not justify giving them the right of veto over a few employees in the District of Columbia and not giving them the same authority over other employees, and if you once let the camel's nose under the tent and give them the right to veto individual increases or decreases in salary in one or two of these establishments the ultimate result will be to confer upon that bureau the power to pass on the wages of all of the Government departments, for that is what it amounts to when you give them the right to approve or disapprove.

I do not think we ought to agree to this amendment. I think we ought to give the Budget Bureau an opportunity to justify itself within the powers it already possesses, by more experience, rather than confer upon that bureau additional powers, and especially powers not contemplated in the original act.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And, furthermore, the Budget Bureau has not the time to do this work, has it?

Mr. BARKLEY. No. That is the fact. It has all it can attend to now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 36, after line 17, insert a new section to be known as section 13, as follows:
> "That, subject to revision and approval by the Bureau of the Budget, the rates of compensation of all employees in the District of Columbia, except those whose wages are adjusted by now existing wage boards, to whom the compensation schedules are made inapplicable by section 3 hereof, shall be fixed and readjusted from time to time by a board of three members to be appointed by the President and to hold office during his pleasure. One member of such board shall be chosen from among the employees affected, one representative of the Government, and one representative of the public. The members of this board shall serve without compensation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, after line 17, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 13. That the estimates of the expenditures and appropriations set forth in the budget to be transmitted by the President to Congress on the first day of the next ensuing regular session shall conform to the classification herein provided, and that the rates of salary in the compensation schedules shall not become effective until the first day of the fiscal year estimated for in such budget."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been just a little surprised at some of the opposition to this measure. I have said to some of the gentlemen who oppose it, "What do you propose to do in the matter of the adjustment of the salaries of Federal employees; what are you going to do with the bonus?" Generally, some did not just know. Some assumed an attitude of "Oh, what is the use of doing anything? Why not just drift along? Some day we may be compelled to do something, and we will act then."

Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with that view of legislation. I can not believe it is wise to persist in refusing to meet a situation until it develops into a catastrophe and then hurriedly enact legislation not so much to cure the situation as to cure the catastrophe that grew out of it.

At one time I served for nearly two years as Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office, and among other duties I had charge of the personnel of the office. At that time I obtained a pretty fair idea not only of the personnel in that office but through investigations that I entered upon out of my interest in the problems we met I gained a very considerable knowledge with regard to conditions in the public service generally.

I made up my mind then that a general reclassification or readjustment of the public service was important. That was over 20 years ago, and conditions have not improved in the interval. In fact, during the war they grew worse. We created new bureaus, new establishments, and we fixed new wage rates, and we accentuated and increased and made more inequitable the inequities already existing in the public service. We provided inadequately and not entirely equitably for the increased cost of living in the way of a bonus. What are we going to do about it; just drift along; just drop part of the bonus some day and leave conditions still more inequitable, or drop all of it and leave conditions in certain classes of employment intolerable, or shall we rather proceed in a logical, sensible, and businesslike way and secure a readjustment of salaries and place the Government service on a business basis? That is what this bill proposes and all it proposes. We are proposing to pass it early enough in the legislative year, the Senate being willing, that the departments and bureaus of the Government shall have months within which to allocate their employees in the new classifications. We are making provision under which the Bureau of the Budget, responsible to the President for estimates and costs of government, shall have a sufficient period of time in which to review the allocations and reallocate and reassign where in their opinion and judgment that ought to be done. In due course, without hurry, with plenty of time to adjust the matter fully and settle it fairly, the new classifications will be fixed as the basis of pay for the following fiscal year. We have not proposed anything in this Congress more reasonable, more logical, more carefully considered. Some gentlemen claimed that the range of salaries was too high. Meeting that view, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] has presented, and the committee has accepted, a very considerable reduction in the range of salaries. The question is asked, How much will it cost? No man can say absolutely. If the allocations were all made at the top salaries it would cost considerably more with the same number of employees in the same service than at present. And if they were all placed in the lower ranges of salaries it would cost less, and if fairly allocated between the top ranges and the lower ranges of salaries the probability is that the same number of employees would receive but little more than now. And so we have had presented, carefully considered, thoroughly debated, a fine constructive piece of legislation. I want to congratulate the gentleman from New Jersey and his committee on the way they have handled this bill under fire. [Applause.] I am glad there has been this critical examination, because I think out of it has come to those who have listened attentively the conviction that the legislation is not only wise but that it is absolutely essential. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] expressed some surprise at the attitude that some of us have occupied in our position on this bill. Well, I can say to the gentleman from Wyoming that he is not the only person who is surprised at the attitude of gentlemen in the discussion on this bill. Some of us are considerably surprised at the attitude of the gentleman from Wyoming with reference to this bill, as some have been considerably surprised before at his attitude with reference to guarding the Treasury of the United States. Now, he says we will take and consider it in a good, businesslike way and determine it as business men. Now, just think of the proposition that he is asking us here to determine as business men, watchful of our ordinary private individual interests, when he knows that the thing is impossible, that this thing is all predicated upon conditions that existed when the cost of living had reached its peak and upon conditions that now exist, when the cost of living is more than 50 per cent higher than it ought to be. He is making that sort of contention, appealing to the credulity rather than the intelligence of this body, in asking us to give this bill our support. Business men all over this country are trying to reduce business conditions to a normal situation. The railroad managers of the country, the Interstate Commerce Commission of the country, the labor boards of this country, are trying as best they know how to reduce the wages paid to the employees of the great railroad systems that we may get back as fast as possible to normalcy. There is a great strike to-day among the employees of the packers of this country. Why? Because the great packers of this country are trying like business men to get back to business ways, to normal conditions that existed before we got into this war, and yet the leader of the Republican side is appealing to this House, asking us to fasten upon the overburdened taxpayers an abnormal set of salaries, passed at an abnormal time, based upon abnormal conditions, and to continue throughout all time.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman from Wyoming stated that probably the amount carried by this bill would be necessarily a little higher than the salaries now carried. I was wondering if he includes in that the bonus which was put in the bill to take care of the increased salaries at higher prices?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; that has been repeatedly stated, that the bonus is included in it and made permanent forever, so if we are to act like business men I suggest you do not take the advice of the gentleman from Wyoming but discharge your duties toward the taxpayers of this country as you would discharge your duties if you were running this as your own business. You know there is not one of you who would make up a salary list for men in your factory by which you would be bound for years and years and years.
